Resolved, That in the opinion of this commission it is inexpedient if not impracticable to extend the Capitol building so as to provide additional space for the rapid growth of the Library without seriously interfering with the architectural proportions thereof, and also its conveniences for legislative purposes, but that "practical and beneficial" changes, such as mentioned in the act creating this board, can and should be made at no distant day in and of the Capitol for the better accommodation of the two Houses of Congress. We therefore recommend the erection of a separate edifice for the Library.

Very respectfully submitted,

EDWARD CLARK.
ALEX. R. ESTY.
J. L. SMITHMEYER.

WASHINGTON, D. C., September 25, 1880.

The Library Committees of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses accepted and concurred in the views of the commission, and made elaborate reports to Congress on the subject. The committee of the present Congress also concur in the views of the commission for the following reasons:

First. Because the rapid growth of the Library would in a few years more than fill any addition to the Capitol which could possibly be made without destroying entirely its architectural beauty and proportions.

Secondly. That the increase of Senators and Representatives in Congress will require all the available space in the Capitol, or any annex which could properly be made thereto, for their accommodation in the way of committee-rooms, document-rooms, &c.

Thirdly. That the large mass of combustible material, such as newspaper files, pamphlets, &c., stowed in the Capitol building, parts of which are not fire-proof, would not only endanger the Library, but the building itself. It is estimated by these same architects that should a fire occur in the Library and the outlying rooms over it, communicating with the combustible material in the crypt under the Dome, that the foundations of the Dome would be so affected by the heat as to make it probable that it would topple to the ground.

Fourthly. That no other national library is made the repository of all copyright records as well as two copies of each publication, which, by act of Congress, we are bound to regard as trust property and carefully protect. Not only the books, but thousands of maps, charts, engravings, photographs, and chromos, which are often of considerable bulk, and occupy more space than the books themselves.

Fifthly. That no other national library of a great people is required to be located in the building devoted to legislative purposes. The national library of France, the largest in the world, with its two million three hundred thousand volumes, has a building detached from the halls of legislation, covering an area of 4½ acres. The British Museum, with its one million five hundred thousand volumes, covering an area of 5 acres, is also detached from the houses of Parliament. So of the library of Bavaria at Munich, with its nine hundred thousand volumes; of Russia, at St. Petersburg, with its one million volumes, and of Germany, at Berlin, with its seven hundred and fifty thousand volumes, the only five libraries in the world larger than our own.

Sixthly. If economy is to be our watchword, a separate building must be erected. Any extension of the Capitol heretofore proposed, affording adequate accommodations for the Library, even for twenty years, would involve an expenditure, according to the opinion of Mr. Walter, the former Architect of the Capitol, of $4,500,000, and according to the present Architect, Edward Clark, of $4,200,000, while the estimate for the building proposed by the committee, made by J. L. Smithmeyer, who drew the plan, will cost $2,323,600, making a difference in favor of the Government, according to Walter's estimate, of $2,176,400, or a saving of nearly one-half, and according to Clark's estimate a difference of $1,876,400.

The reason for this is apparent to the most casual observer. Any annex to the Capitol must correspond to its present style of architecture, which is very costly, being Gothic in character with fluted columns and elaborately sculptured caps. This style is not needed in a separate building, and it would be an act of vandalism, never to be forgiven, to deface this beautiful structure, which has cost over $13,000,000, by tacking on to it a cheap Library edifice.

In every aspect of the case, therefore, a new separate building is demanded. Its necessity has been favorably and unanimously reported upon by six successive joint committees charged with the consideration of the subject. Since the year 1873, when it first came to be discussed, there has never been an adverse report or even a dissenting voice from any member of a committee. Your Librarian joins in the general demand for it, and outside of this House I have not met a single individual who does not favor it.

STYLE AND CHARACTER OF THE BUILDING.

As to the style and character of the building you have before you not only the report of the commission of experts and the report of your committee, but a diagram which represents the ground floor and its internal arrangement, to which the other stories must largely conform. You have also a diagram giving the architectual appearance of the outside of the structure, which is after the Italian renaissance style, a style once greatly in favor, but which being abandoned for a season for the Gothic and other styles has been revived and approximates the classic style. To my unskilled eye this diagram presents a unique and pleasing appearance without being so stately as to bring it into competition with the Capitol or so gaudy as to offend cultivated taste.

The building is to be 450 by 300 feet, arranged with open courts at every convenient point to afford proper light and ventilation, with still further means of ventilation by down draught, a system tested in other large institutions with abundant success. The reading-room or rotunda, 100 feet in diameter, just the size of the Rotunda in the Capitol, is to be shelved around with four tiers of shelves, and will hold, with the immediately connecting alcoves, about one million books. This reading-room is accessible only to students, and not to visitors generally. Around the rotunda or reading-room in the second story will be a balcony, from which visitors can view the reading-room and entire Library without disturbing those engaged in study. The alcoves radiating from the rotunda or reading-room are to be supplied with iron shelving, from time to time, as the growth of the Library may demand, at an estimated cost of about $14,000 a year, which without taking a dollar from the Treasury will be more than met by fees from the copyright system, which amount to $20,000 annually. Large rooms are to be provided for the display of maps, pictures, and other works of graphic art. The building will be so constructed as to admit of necessary additions without marring its beauty or proportions. It will be built of stone, brick, iron, and glass, and will be entirely fire-proof, there being no wood in or about it except desks and chairs in the reading and administrative rooms.

In the central room of the present Library will be retained about seventy thousand volumes of such books as Congress in its deliberations is most likely to consult, leaving the two wings to be converted into about fifteen or twenty committee-rooms, now so much needed for the convenience and proper dispatch of business by the two Houses of Congress.

APPROPRIATIONS ASKED FOR.

The appropriations asked for will be $500,000 to begin the work, $1,000,000 at the next session to continue it, and $823,600 at the succeeding session to complete it. This, of course, does not embrace the purchase of the site. It is confidently believed that these sums will finish the building so far as needed at present and for many years to come; and no further outlay need be made by the Government, utilizing, as before stated, the fees from the copyright system to put in shelving, &c., to meet the growing wants of the Library.

ITS LOCATION.

I come now to the last point which I think it necessary to discuss before the House, namely, the location of the proposed building. Upon this point there seems to be more divergence of views among members than upon any other. And while I think I can show that your committee acted wisely in recommending its location upon the plateau east of the Capitol grounds, yet after all this is a minor point when compared with the important fact of securing the Library building itself. But let us look calmly into the facts of the case. I would ask gentlemen who oppose the site recommended by the committee to name a more advantageous one. In doing this they must keep in mind that books must be protected alike from heat and moisture; that they are to be kept, not for a single year, or a single generation, but for as long a period as matter in that form can exist; that this Library building should be so constructed and located as to afford to Congress and all reading people the readiest means of access, and by its economic arrangement require as few agents and employés as practicable, thus securing convenience, order, and economy.

Keeping in mind these considerations, let us examine the several propositions advocated by the friends of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] at the last session, when a proposition to fix a day for the consideration of this bill was before the House, based their opposition to it upon the ground that the committee did not report in favor of erecting the building upon some one of the many Government reservations in the city. I will not stop to answer this objection myself, but will have read at the Clerk's desk a letter from A. F. Rockwell, colonel United States Army, lately in charge of the Government reservations. The answer he gives must be conclusive to every unprejudiced mind:

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
Washington, D. C., February 15, 1884.

DEAR SIR: In reply to the verbal request of the 13th instant from your committee that I submit a statement as to whether there is a public reservation among those owned by the United States in this city which would be suitable as a site for the proposed new building for the Library of Congress, and the expression of my views in reference thereto, I have the honor to say that, in the first place, understanding that the proposed structure will require a site containing at least 3 acres of ground, there are but eleven reservations which meet this requirement as to size, and they are: Executive Mansion grounds, 82 acres; Washington Monument grounds, 78 acres; Lafayette Square, 6 acres; Franklin Square, 4 acres; Mount Vernon Square, 3 acres; Smithsonian grounds, 58 acres; Armory Square and reservations east to Botanical Gardens, 33 acres; Judiciary Square, 19 acres; Lincoln Square, 6 acres; and Stanton Square, 3 acres; and reservation number 17, 23 acres (irrespective of present street surfaces).

The only part of the Executive Mansion grounds available for the erection of an additional public building would be that portion south of the Mansion, and the occupation of this spot would largely interrupt and cut off the present fine view of the river, which was undoubtedly one of the main reasons for the selection of this site for the President's house.

The same objection mentioned in the preceding paragraph would also seem to apply to the selection of the Monument grounds as a site for the proposed building.

Lafayette, Franklin, and Mount Vernon Squares are the most largely frequented of any of the public reservations, and, especially the two former, are the most highly improved parks in the city. To select either of these as a site for the proposed Library building would utterly destroy their usefulness as places of public resort.

The distance of the above five reservations from the Capitol would also seem to be a strong argument against their selection.

Following down the list we have the Smithsonian grounds, the higher portions of which are now occupied by two immense buildings, the Smithsonian Institution and National Museum building, leaving as available only the northern part of the grounds, which is entirely too low to be used as a building site, having been more than once flooded to the depth of several feet by water from the Potomac River during spring freshets.

This same objection will apply to the Armory Square and reservations east to Botanical Gardens, and an additional one will also be found in the occupation of a large portion of the reservation by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, and the Armory building now used by the United States Fish Commission.

Judiciary Square should not, in my judgment, be further encroached upon being already occupied by the City Hall and the new Pension building.

Lincoln and Stanton Squares are the only improved parks east of the Capitol, and the selection of either would deprive the residents of East Washington of much-needed breathing space. In addition, one of these squares (Lincoln) would appear to be too far from the Capitol for the purpose desired.

Reservation No. 17 (the last to be considered) is situated about three squares southeast of the Capitol, between South Capitol and Third streets east and E street south and Virginia avenue, and, when the present street surfaces are incorporated, will contain an area of about 40 acres. The improvements made on the grounds have been necessarily confined to grading, draining, and surface-soiling. In addition to the present unfinished condition of the reservation and the character of its surroundings, its topography would seem to render it specially unsuitable for the proposed building.

In conclusion, I beg most respectfully to protest against the selection of any portion of the public grounds in this city as the sites for additional public buildings. These grounds have been especially set aside for public parks, i. e., open spaces, and to encroach upon them with buildings will defeat the objects for which they are designed.

I venture to express the opinion that it should be the policy of the Government to increase, rather than diminish, the area of park surfaces, as they have a direct and beneficial effect upon the health and happiness of the people in cities which are blessed with such places of recreative resort.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. F. ROCKWELL,
Colonel, United States Army, in charge.

Hon. O. R. SINGLETON,
Chairman Joint Committee on the Library, House of Representatives.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, I can add nothing to the forcible reasoning of Colonel Rockwell. He was for years in charge of these grounds; knows every foot of each reservation, and, like a public-spirited and sensible man charged with an important public trust, enters his protest against further encroachment upon the public parks, which are intended for the recreation and health of the people of the city, and recommends an increase rather than a diminution of the park surfaces.

Some of the friends of the bill insist, nevertheless, that the reservation now occupied by the Botanic Garden is the proper place for the building. Do gentlemen know that in times of flood in the Potomac River the whole of that reservation which has not been built up is subject to overflow? Do they know that for much of the time in winter the pumps are kept in action to prevent the extinguishment of the furnace fires which warm the conservatory? Do they know that Tiber Creek, which is arched over and hid from view, flows under the center of that square, and at times, after a heavy rainfall, a flood-gate, which has been erected in connection with it, has to be thrown open, not to drain the water from the reservation, but to allow it to escape from the stream into those grounds to save the arch or sewer from being broken up and destroyed?

Do they know that no foundation, even for a small edifice, can be had in these grounds without driving down piling for the purpose; that in locating the Peace Monument, as it is called, at the west entrance to the Capitol grounds, piling had to be used 20 feet long? Do they know that in digging down 2 feet anywhere on this square in the winter season water will fill the excavation? If not cognizant of these facts, let me assure them that they do exist. Is this, then, a proper place to locate a library building, and launch it, like Noah's ark, upon the flood tide of the Tiber and the Potomac? I have often heard of a circulating library, but never before of a floating one. I send to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a communication from General Babcock:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
Washington, D. C., May 18, 1876.

GENERAL: In reply to your communication of May 17, inquiring as to the nature of the public grounds lying between Pennsylvania and Maryland avenues in this city, known as the Botanic Garden, I have the honor to submit the following information and opinion:

There is no record in this office that shows the amount of filling, though in my opinion there will be found made ground over the greater part of the inclosure, and in places to the depth of 5 to 8 feet. The inclosure contains many springs, and along the line of the Tiber Creek, now sewered, there will be found marshy ground.

The Baltimore and Potomac Railroad depot, at the corner of B and Sixth streets, is on the line of the Tiber Creek. The engineer in constructing this building found it necessary to place the whole foundation of the building on piles. They used piles 45 feet in length and drove them on the average 28 feet to a firm strata. From the above data, my observation in work along the line of the Tiber Creek from Third to Seventeenth streets, and from the opinion of persons who have known the Botanic Garden grounds for the last thirty-five or forty years, I am of the opinion that no heavy building can be safely constructed within that inclosure without a foundation resting on piles over the greater part if not all the grounds.

I am, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. E. BABCOCK,
Colonel of Engineers, United States Army.

Brig. Gen. A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, United States Army.

But the question has been, and may be again, asked why not buy the lots south of the Capitol, which can be had for a price below those lying east of it? I should think a simple glance at these lots ought to satisfy every practical man of the impropriety of building a library in a frog-pond or upon a hillside, where the west end of it, unless the grounds are filled up and terraced, would be at least two stories higher than the east end. Not relying upon my own judgment, I propose to let Edward Clark, Architect of the Capitol, speak upon this point. He says:

ARCHITECT'S OFFICE, UNITED STATES CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1886.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your inquiry as to the practicability of placing a building of the extent of that proposed for the new Library building on squares 635 and 636, lying south of the western grounds of the Capitol, I have the honor to state as follows: That owing to the inequality of the grade, about 60 feet between the highest and lowest points, it will be exceedingly difficult and expensive to place so large a building upon these squares, as the western front of the building and a portion of the north and south fronts would necessarily be several stories higher than the corresponding portions of the eastern front unless terracing were resorted to, which would be difficult and expensive to construct. The additional cost of foundations, together with that of the terrace, would, in my opinion, amount to a sum approximating the cost of a corresponding area of land of even grade.

Very respectfully, yours,

EDWARD CLARK,
Architect United States Capitol.

Hon. OTHO R. SINGLETON,
Chairman Joint Committee on Library, House of Representatives.

I have consulted him as to the squares north of the Capitol, and he informs me that the same objections hold good as to those squares, though not to the same extent; but that in any event, to purchase either of them and secure a proper foundation, which would be difficult to obtain if to be had at all, fill up and terrace them, would cost in the end about the same as the proposed lots east and would be a far less desirable location.

THE COST OF THE SITE.

Gentlemen object to the price to be paid for the lots named in the bill without knowing what that price will be. They seem to think that because the bill limits the maximum for that purpose to $550,000, therefore that sum will necessarily be paid for the lots. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior, the Librarian of Congress, and the Architect of the Capitol shall constitute a commission whose duty it shall be to contract with the owners of the property at private sale, if reasonable terms can be had; and, if not, they are authorized to apply to the proper legal tribunal for the condemnation of the property for public use. The gentlemen charged with these duties are all honorable men, and it is not to be supposed that any detriment will come to the public interests while they hold this trust. They will buy the property at reasonable prices from the owners, or not buy at all, but resort to the courts for an assessment of damages. These are the only two ways in which any piece of private property can be converted to public use.

Gentlemen cry out "a job! a swindle!" and hope to frighten reasonable men by this senseless clamor. I call upon them to give the names of these would-be plunderers, or hide their heads for very shame that they have resorted to such trick or subterfuge. Let them beat the bill if they can by fair and honorable means, but not hope by covert insinuations and improper innuendoes to defeat this commendable work. Point out the rascals who are planning a raid upon your Treasury, and I will go as far as he who goes farthest to expose and punish them.

But why should gentlemen take fright at the imagined prices to be paid for these lots? Review for a moment the past legislation of Congress upon the subject of the purchase of private property for public uses, and we find that for the site of the post-office at Philadelphia we paid $1,491,201, or $17.53 per square foot; at Chicago, $1,259,385, or $9.90 per square foot; at Boston, $1,329,096, or $27.96 per square foot; at Cincinnati, $708,036, or $9.96 per square foot; at Baltimore, $553,500, or $10.39 per square foot; and I have no doubt some of the gentlemen who are clamoring against the purchase of a site for a great national library recorded their votes in favor of the purchases I have named. The site which the bill under consideration proposes to purchase, even allowing that the maximum price named therein shall be paid, taking the streets into account, which already belong to the Government, will only be $1.16 per square foot, or excluding the streets, $2.43 per foot, being less than one-fourth the amount paid for the cheapest property I have already named, and less than one-eleventh of that paid for the Boston site, it being the most costly. In each of these cases, Baltimore excepted, the property was acquired by condemnation. Why fear the same process for acquiring a site for the Library? Are the courts in Washington less trustworthy than those in the other cities named? Is there no honesty among Washington officials?

Mr. Chairman, no farce more ludicrous is ever played before this House than to see gentlemen who wish to pose before the country as great economists and reformers loading themselves with the public treasure when their districts are to be benefited and wagging off with it to improve some creek which will scarcely float an Indian canoe, or to erect a public building at some place for ornament rather than for use; then to see these same gentlemen hold up their hands in holy horror when an appropriation is to be made for some useful and necessary improvement, and with "visages that cream and mantle like a standing pond" cry out to the friends of the measure, "O thou most unclean!" I would commend for their careful perusal the scathing lines of Burns addressed to the "unco guid and rigidly righteous." He says:

O ye wha are sae guid yoursel,
Sae pious and sae holy,
Ye've naught to do but mark and tell
Your neebors' fauts and folly.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have said enough, and I fear too much, upon this subject. I fear I have vexed the ear and wearied the patience of the House. If so, I appeal to the friends of this measure not to allow a good cause to suffer by reason of a poor advocate. I ask them to rally to its support and not suffer themselves to be demoralized by the clangor of Chinese gongs which will be sounded about their ears. Extravagance and fraud will constitute the slogan of the opponents of this bill; the rules of the House will be again ransacked for some short way to get rid of it; the "Great Objector," as heretofore, will probably interpose his objections; but it is to be hoped that down our line will ring out the words "vive le Library!" until some proper bill is matured and passed.

Why should we not have a library equal in all respects to any in the world? We are rapidly marching to the front in all that constitutes a nation's greatness. In the arts and sciences, in inventive genius, in statesmanship, in diplomacy, in oratory, in wealth—in all that makes up the best type of mankind—we are not a whit behind nations that have grown hoary with age and gouty from luxurious living. In years, it is true, ours is but a stripling among nations; but our young giant stands not abashed in the presence of any vaunting Goliath. Yes, Mr. Chairman, our march must be onward and upward. Our boys must be educated; they must not only have workshops for their hands but also for their brains; and the implements of intellectual warfare, which are books, must be placed within their reach. Our children, though not born great, are born with the elements of greatness in them, which, like the marble in the quarry, lie dormant until utilized and made fit for the builder's use.

There is no royal road in this our land to glory and to greatness; each man must be the architect of his own fortune and fame, and if he ever "climb the steep where Fame's proud temple shines afar," it must be done by toil and self-denial. Schools and books must be ready at hand to arouse ambition, stimulate genius, and encourage to labor, since by these means alone men become great. It has been well said:

We have not wings, we can not soar,
But we have feet to scale and climb;
By slow degrees, by more and more,
The lofty summits of our time.

The heights by great men gained and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight;
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

Mr. Chairman, I desire now, under the advice of friends, to move that the committee rise and report this bill favorably to the House, giving notice that I shall call the previous question upon it. It has been thoroughly discussed heretofore, and I think every member understands it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does the gentleman mean to say that the other side of this question is not to be debated at all?

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to address the Committee on the Whole on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that the committee rise. That motion is in order. If the motion be voted down, of course the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will be recognized.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Did the gentleman from Mississippi accompany his motion with the proposition that the bill be reported favorably to the House?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not so understand.

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, sir, my motion was that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House; and I shall move the previous question when we get into the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to address the Chair on the bill, and I propose to submit an amendment. The motion to rise and report the bill favorably is of course debatable. Amendment and debate can not be cut off at this stage. The gentleman can move that the committee rise, but he can not move to take the bill from the Committee of the Whole if there is an amendment offered.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No amendment has been offered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am proposing to offer one as soon as I am recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will change my motion and move that the committee rise for the purpose of limiting general debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like the gentleman from Mississippi to state what limit to the debate he proposes. We ought to know that before the committee rises.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. I think the Chair distinctly recognized me as having the floor.

Mr. DUNHAM. Regular order!

Mr. HOLMAN. That is what I am talking about.

Mr. SOWDEN. I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is on the floor upon a question of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. I addressed the Chair, and stated that I wished to offer an amendment. The Chair then requested that the amendment be sent up. Then the gentleman from Mississippi rose and proposed to change his motion. I submit that I was recognized and was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SOWDEN. I rise to a point of order. My point is that the gentleman from Indiana is out of order pending the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Mississippi originally to make the motion that the committee rise and report the bill favorably. Upon that state of the question the gentleman from Indiana proposed to offer an amendment, which would authorize him to proceed to debate the proposition.

Mr. SINGLETON. I afterward modified my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Mississippi then to modify his motion so as to move simply that the committee rise.

Mr. HOLMAN. But had my friend from Mississippi the floor for that purpose? I submit that I undoubtedly had the floor. The Chair had recognized me, and of course the gentleman from Mississippi could not take me off the floor by modifying his motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had recognized the gentleman from Indiana; and if he insists upon recognition the Chair will accord it to him.

Mr. DUNHAM. I rise to a point of order. Did not the Chair afterward recognize the gentleman from Mississippi to restate his motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did so; but the gentleman from Indiana was on the floor, and could not properly be taken off the floor in that way by the Chair or any one else.

Mr. DUNHAM. As a matter of fact, did not the Chair take him off the floor and recognize the gentleman from Mississippi to restate his motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Indiana is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit the following substitute for the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That a fire-proof building for a library shall be erected at such place in the city of Washington, D. C., and on such ground owned by the United States, as the commissioners of the District of Columbia, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall select and designate. The plan of such building shall be prepared by the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, subject to the approval of the Joint Committee on the Library. The plan of the building shall be such that the same shall be completed by an expenditure not exceeding $1,000,000, and the plan thereof as to the cost of construction within the limit above specified shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury. The construction of said building shall be under the charge of the Secretary of the Treasury.

"2. That all books and other literary works which have accumulated or shall from time to time accumulate in the Library of Congress, and not required for the purposes of said Library of Congress, shall be deposited in the library proposed to be established by this act when said building shall be completed, and be subject to public use, under such rules and regulations as the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress shall prescribe.

"3. The sum of $500,000 is hereby appropriated for the commencement of said building out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"4. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great pleasure to the admirable remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON]. His long service in this House, extending back beyond that of any other gentleman on the floor, his large acquaintance with public affairs and uniform kindness and courtesy entitle him always to a very respectful hearing. His remarks not only touching the subject of the Library, the propriety of erecting such a building, and the necessity for it, but his general remarks on the subject of libraries and books have interested us all and undoubtedly met the general approval of the gentlemen present. They were elegantly expressed and specially becoming in a literary discussion. In many respects I agree with my friend from Mississippi, certainly as to books and libraries in general, and most cordially on one point, the force of which my friend I apprehend overlooks, that of adhering to the original design of a Congressional Library, for I think it clear the measure involved in the bill pending is a departure from the policy of our fathers, an abandonment of the purpose for which the Library of Congress was originally designed.

Through the greater portion of the history of Congress, almost from the beginning, that purpose has been steadily pursued; that is, the founding of a library for the benefit, convenience, and information of the two Houses of Congress, and with that purpose steadily in view a library invaluable to Congress, a library upon which we make demands every hour, has grown to its present most respectable proportion.

The very idea suggested by my friend that the policy of the Library ought to be maintained, if upon no other ground in respect for the policy of our fathers, is one I cordially indorse. But I submit to my friend that his bill is an entire departure from that policy. The measure I submit is in perfect harmony with it and proposes to carry out the exact plan upon which the Congressional Library was originally established and has been maintained up to this time. It proposes to maintain it intact as originally established, a Congressional Library, within the reach at any moment of members of the House and Senate. My friend's plan virtually involves the removal of the Library from its old depository to a point distant from the Halls of Senate and House.

The library structure in this Capitol, midway between House and Senate, improved and greatly enlarged within the last twenty-five years, understood at the time to be fire-proof—a library structure which in its adaptation for the preservation of books has, I think, never been the subject of doubt, and which is capable of accommodating from 250,000 to 300,000 volumes. The number of books coming to the Library under our present copyright system of necessity rapidly increases. Until the adoption of the present law touching copyrights, and the accumulation of books in the Library under that system, it was supposed that the library structure, as improved and enlarged as I have mentioned, would meet the requirements of the Congressional Library during the present century and beyond. It was understood then to be fire-proof and admirably adapted to the original purpose, for it was not likely that a larger accumulation of books required for the use, information, and business of Congress, according to the original design of the Library, than 200,000 or 300,000 volumes, would occur for several generations. Such would have been the probable result if works suited to such a library had only been accumulated by suitable purchases, the scientific productions of our own institutions, gifts accepted by Congress, and works received from other Governments in mutual exchange.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman knows, as well as I can state it, that a large part of the building in and about the Library is not fire-proof. It has been so reported by the Architect of the Capitol. We are therefore constantly endangering the building itself as well as the books in the Library by keeping combustible material there.

Mr. HOLMAN. There may be some combustible material in the vicinity of the Library, but as there are some books we held in sacred trust Congress was anxious that the Library should be made fire-proof, and it was ordered to be made fire-proof. The best ability at the time was employed to make it fire-proof, and I indulge the hope that the apprehension of my friend is not correct, and that the building is still a fire-proof building.

But the effect of the copyright law was the accumulation of a vast number of books yearly many of which are valuable, a still greater number of no special value, a great number of no value to such a Library. The question is what shall be done to meet this accumulation of books not needed in the Congressional Library? I may be permitted to say in this connection that I know of no city of the population of Washington and with so intelligent a people in which the whole people do not feel a lively interest in a library open at all times and to all the people, a library especially belonging to the people and to which the whole people can have constant and ready access. Washington city is no exception to the rule. It is a library such as this open to all, accessible to all that I propose.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired. The committee will therefore rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having taken the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 1297) authorizing the construction of a building for the accommodation of the Congressional Library, had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. SINGLETON to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A joint resolution (H. Res. 71) authorizing the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds in the District of Columbia to supply plants and shrubs to fill certain vases in the Pension building;

A bill (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn.;

A bill (H. R. 5841) granting a pension to Almira Russell Hancock, widow of Winfield Scott Hancock, late a major-general in the United States Army; and

A bill (S. 416) for the relief of J. M. Lobban.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the Indian appropriation bill. The Clerk will read the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support of Indian industrial school at Salem, Oreg.: Two hundred Indian pupils, at $175 per annum each, $35,000; pay of superintendent, $1,500; completion of school building and necessary outbuildings and repairs and fencing, $5,000; in all, $40,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has made a point of order against this provision of the bill.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, I made the same point of order last evening during the consideration of this bill upon this paragraph as had been made to the preceding item with reference to the Carlisle school, which point of order had been sustained by the Committee of the Whole.

I did it, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of showing to the committee that there was a mistake somewhere, that something was wrong somewhere, either in the ruling of the committee on that question or else that the House had made a mistake in the rules adopted by it at the beginning of the session. I wanted to emphasize the fact that somewhere there had been a mistake. It is certain that if this item with reference to Mr. Pratt was properly stricken from the bill on the point of order on any of the grounds that it may be possible to conceive, then, upon the same grounds, upon the same logic, and on the same reasoning, as well as upon the same technical construction of the law, these other items in the bill should be excluded. This is clear, for it must be apparent that they stand upon the same footing, and they have no basis at all except what you may call their standing in the annual appropriation bills.

But, Mr. Chairman, having demonstrated this fact, as I think, satisfactorily to the committee, and having also demonstrated that there was something serious in the attitude the committee assumed on yesterday, I am now content; and to avoid further delaying the passage of the bill I withdraw the point of order upon this item.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order being withdrawn, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of one hundred and twenty Indian pupils at the school at Hampton, Va., $20,040.

Mr. PEEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 1048 add:

"Provided no part of the amount hereby appropriated shall be used to educate or maintain any Indian pupil not now enrolled and in actual attendance at said school."

Mr. PEEL. In offering that amendment, Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee I wish to state that I do not desire to further obstruct the consideration of the bill and shall delay it but for a moment.

That proposition covers the elementary principles of the system of the education of these Indian children. My object in confining the appropriation to the maintenance and education of those already enrolled and attending the school is to change the future policy in this regard. This school, to which the amendment refers, is not one of the schools termed Government schools. It is one where the Indian students are simply educated under a contract by the Government; not like that at Carlisle, Pa. This school at Hampton, and the Lincoln Institute in Philadelphia, and the different schools in the different States where the Indian students are educated, are schools of the character to which I desire this principle to apply.

All that class of schools are simply contract schools. The Government, in its present policy, appropriates money out of the public Treasury to pay agents to go to the Indian country to gather up these children. It then pays the expense of transporting them many hundreds of miles from their homes to be educated. After incurring the expense of educating them it pays a further amount to transport them back to their original country to become Indians again.

The policy is wrong. It is bad economy. I think the expenditure of the appropriation should be confined to those who are now enrolled in the school, so it will stop in the future the gathering of the children off their reservations in the far West, the paying the expense of collecting them, and the additional expense of transporting them to the schools and back home to become Indians as they were originally.

In the investigation made by the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was chairman, and of which my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and my friend from Kansas [Mr. RYAN] were also members, after taking the testimony of military men of experience, of contractors of experience, of agents of experience—in the investigation of these Indian schools throughout the entire Western reservations, not a single exception appears in our report where there was an Indian child taken and educated in the contract schools and sent back, unless employed by the Government, who did not return to his original state.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN was recognized and yielded his time to Mr. PEEL.

Mr. PEEL. If that report then is correct, if it is a fact that that system does not carry out the object intended, it is certainly wrong. We are simply throwing away money. We ought to take the money we are using for this purpose and extend the system of the industrial schools on the reservations, the only schools which have proved satisfactory in their results, and which will prove beneficial to the Indians. In that way we will be appropriating money that will yield a return for the expense the Government is at to educate those children, if that education is worth anything.

If, after a thorough investigation of months of the results of these schools, we find they have been a failure, then the system is an erroneous one, and the appropriations we are making to-day on these contract schools are thrown away.

I understand that my amendment does not affect the Government schools, but only such schools as the Government enters its students into under contract at so much per scholar. The money hitherto appropriated has been expended to send them there to educate them, and to send them back to the Indian country where, according to the experience of our committee, they will fall back and become Indians again. I say we should stop that.

Let this money now appropriated be confined to the education of those who are already in those contract schools. Carry out in good faith the contracts already existing, and then in the future let whatever money we appropriate be expended on the industrial and agricultural schools on the reservations, where the Indian children can be educated to take care of themselves in the presence of their parents, and where the education given the children may have a good effect on the whole tribe. You will thus hold what you gain and the money will not be wasted.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas. If it be true that the further maintenance of these schools is a waste of money, is an uneconomical method of education, then it ought to be discontinued. If these schools are not meeting the ends for which they are intended, then the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas is correct. But I would like to invite the considerate attention of the committee to the testimony of some recognized authorities upon this question. And first, I desire to read a single passage from the current report of the board of Indian commissioners, the report which has just come from the press. I read from that report, on page 7, as follows:

What will become of these pupils of our industrial training-schools when they go back to the Indian reservations is a question of great and growing importance. Hitherto the number has not been very large, and for nearly all so far some suitable employment has been found. It has been asserted in some Western papers that when the Indian boys and girls go back to their tribes they return to savage life and the customs of their people; and this is quoted at the East and even in Congress as true. But it is by no means true.

The gentleman has just stated the same now—

But it is by no means true. It is made without an investigation of the facts.

The gentleman I know claims to the contrary.

The truth is that of the two hundred and fifty-nine boys and one hundred and fifty-six girls who have been sent home from Carlisle it is known that a large proportion are doing well, far better than we ought to expect from the surroundings of their homes. Nearly fifty are employed in schools; others fill places of laborers, interpreters, mechanics, and policemen at the agencies; others are farming with their parents or on their own account, and several are clerking for traders. Now and then one has gone down to low life, but it is a surprise that the number who do that is so few. Of the one hundred and forty-six who have returned to their homes after three years at the Hampton school two-thirds are doing well as teachers, farmers, mechanics, and laborers.

Again, as said by Commissioners Charlton and Smiley in their report on the Carlisle school (Report of Commissioners, page 39):

It is a commonly received opinion with many of our best people that the relations of our Government with the Indians is a problem which is very difficult to solve. To us it seems to be very simple. Take the fifty thousand Indian children now growing up wild and ignorant, give them a plain English education, with an opportunity to learn a trade while they are acquiring their education; give them when they become of legal age their lands in severalty, with a prohibitive clause against selling it under a certain number of years; give them the right to vote and every right that citizenship carries with it, and in less than twenty years from the present the "Indian," as such, will have become extinct, obliterated by his own option and transformed into a useful and valuable member of society. We risk nothing in affirming that for less than one-quarter of the money now required to keep our Army in the West and on the frontier enough schools like that at Carlisle could be established and supported and the result would be accomplished.

I hold in my hand a letter from Capt. R. H. Pratt, the superintendent of the Carlisle school, under date of March 18. He says in this letter:

One of the agencies Mr. HOLMAN'S committee visited was the Pine Ridge, of Dakota. The agent, Dr. McGillycuddy, in a letter just received, dated the 14th of March, says of our returned Carlisle students as follows:

"Maggie is married to Gay Belt, a full-blood Indian trader, and is doing well. Frank Twiss is our tinsmith; Edgar Fire Thunder, assistant blacksmith. Lizzie Glade is married to a Ponca half-breed and is assisting in the Medicine Root day school. Clarence Three Stars is still doing well as assistant teacher in the boarding school. Tommy is office boy. Baldwin and Gay are working among the Indians, building houses. Amos is working among some of his relatives at Cheyenne agency. Ralph is doing well on Medicine Root Creek, and will be given a position soon. So you see the Pine Ridge children are accounted for, and none have gone back to the blanket."

That is as far as the Pine Ridge agency students are concerned.

I received before the last debate closed a telegram from Captain Pratt, which is printed on page 2462 of the RECORD, under date of March 17, as follows:

CARLISLE, PA., March 17, 1886.

Hon. B. M. CUTCHEON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Letter just received. We have returned to forty-five tribes four hundred and thirty-eight pupils. I have received information that thirty-four are now employed as teachers, &c., in agency and other schools; that forty-two are working for Government at agencies; that twenty-seven are farming for themselves; that fifty-six are attending agency or other schools as pupils; that nine are employed as clerks in the stores; forty-one are reported as doing nothing. Sixty-three have died. Of the balance I have no certain information, but know that a good proportion are employed as scouts and policemen. Since school began, October, 1879, we have had one thousand and forty-one students. Of these I have sent into families hereabouts, for longer or shorter periods, seven hundred and sixteen, coming from all tribes, twenty-four being Apaches and a full proportion being Sioux, Kiowas, Comanches, Cheyennes, and others of the so-called "bad tribes." Only seven of this whole number have been charged with criminal conduct. We always require that unsatisfactory pupils be returned to the school. Forty-two were so returned. Eighty-four are out at present. These attend school among the whites, and are mainly in excess of the number appropriated for, and without material cost to the Government.

So we see that two hundred and seventy-four out of four hundred and thirty-eight are definitely accounted for, and certainly make a good showing for the school. So much for the Carlisle school.

I demonstrated the other day from the letter of Miss Ludlow that of the seventy-three pupils who had returned from the Hampton school only four had gone back to the blanket; one of them an epileptic girl, another a consumptive boy, and the other two were girls who had married full-blood Indians and gone back to Indian life. I think that the work of these schools is fully justified by the testimony I have already cited.

I have more here that I would like to read if time would permit. For instance, I have here a letter from the Right Rev. William H. Hare, D. D., Protestant Episcopal bishop of Southern Dakota, under date March 19, 1886, which I will read. It is addressed to Mr. Herbert Welsh, corresponding secretary of the Indian Rights Association. The bishop says:

PHILADELPHIA, March 19, 1886.

MY DEAR Mr. WELSH: I am amazed at the statement, which you say is gaining currency, that "Indian students from schools at the East relapse almost without exception, on their return home, into barbarism."

Twelve years of my life have been spent as a missionary bishop in work among Indians whose children have been largely represented in these schools. The missions and schools in which I am especially interested are all of them located right among the Indians, and my prepossessions, therefore are altogether enlisted in behalf of schools situated on Indian reservations, and my judgment is that most of the educational work for Indians should be done there.

But I can not shut my eyes to the incalculable service which well-conducted Eastern boarding-schools have done the Indians, and I am filled with alarm when I hear it suggested that their work should be either discontinued or crippled.

(a) These schools serve as high standards by which reservation schools are tested, and they then correct the common tendency to apologize for poor school work on reservations with the thought, "O, this is about the best that can be done with Indians."

(b) They are models to which schools less advantageously placed are working up.

(c) They have placed a practical argument in favor of Indian education before which skepticism has fled and indifference been warmed to zeal.

(d) And they have sent back to the Indian country a large number of young people who have been of great service, intellectually, morally, and practically to their people.

I am aware that much testimony can be produced on the other side. The reasons are not hard to discover. Some students do turn out badly, and such cases make deep impressions.

Indian youth, like young white people, when they come back to their homes from school or college, are apt to have an exaggerated sense of their own importance and want to have their own way. They have ideas of their own and are harder to manage than ignorant Indians; a disagreeable thing to incompetent guides. They know too much to be easily cheated, and they have too much independence to submit to being treated like dogs. To some this is inconvenient.

In a word, these students are in their green-apple stage. People who bite them of course make faces. But let them alone or give them the sunshine of a kind and considerate friendship and they will become ripe and mellow.

Yours, sincerely,

W. H. HARE.

To HERBERT WELSH,
Corresponding Secretary I. R. A.

I have here also a letter from Mr. Herbert Welsh, to whom the letter of Bishop Hare is addressed. Mr. Welsh says:

My testimony is that of a man who works in this Indian cause absolutely without remuneration of any kind. I have no ax to grind. I have no personal interest in any of the Eastern schools. I visited every agency upon the Sioux reservation last autumn, spending two months on the great reservation and traveling 800 miles over it on horseback and in wagon. This is my third visit to to this reservation. In the light of these facts I say unhesitatingly that I believe Hampton, Carlisle, and the Lincoln Institute are essential factors in the solution of the problem. I have seen upon the reservations again and again the boys and girls from Hampton, and I think I have had at least three times the experience regarding them that either Mr. HOLMAN or Mr. CANNON have had.

These children in the great majority of cases were doing well, in some cases splendidly. Agent McLaughlin at Standing Rock, one of the most experienced and successful of Indian agents, spoke to me in the presence of witnesses in terms of high commendation of the returned Hampton children. But take other cases of Indians educated in the East. I know quite a number of Indian ministers belonging to the Episcopal Church, full-blooded Indians, who received their education in the East years ago—not at any of the institutions mentioned, but at other places. These men have for a long time been carrying on the work of the Christian ministry among their own people and have maintained a high standard of Christian living all the while. Our church has one thousand communicants in good standing among the Sioux to-day. I think Mr. HOLMAN had better try again to make a tour of Indian investigation, so as to secure results which are better calculated to stand the test of intelligent criticism than those which he now submits to Congress and the country. With renewed thanks,

Faithfully, yours,

HERBERT WELSH.

Hon. BYRON M. CUTCHEON.

This letter is in full corroboration of the testimony of these other witnesses. Now, Mr. Chairman, in the presence of this testimony I think we ought to adopt no legislation looking to the present extinction of the Carlisle, Hampton, and Lincoln schools. I would, however, favor legislation looking to their ultimate transfer, either to the reservation or rather to the immediate neighborhood of the reservation. I believe in bringing white civilization directly into the presence of the Indian barbarism, and we can not do that if we put the school upon the reservation so well as if we place it adjacent thereto.

We can civilize the Indians better by bringing the two into this immediate contact; but I would not do away with these Eastern Indian schools until we are prepared to remove them bodily, as it were, into immediate contact with the Indians on or near the reservation. I would continue these schools, which are doing this good work for civilization, until full preparation could be made for their transfer, and then, in due time, I would make that transfer.

Mr. PEEL rose.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Just one word more. Here is this great Sioux Nation of about thirty thousand souls. We have one good industrial boarding-school up there; but suppose that instead of using these old Carlisle barracks we could take possession of the old Fort Sully reservation, and there, right in the presence of Indian life, in the presence of this great tribe, put down the Carlisle school where that whole nation could look upon it, where they could visit their children, could get inspiration from the influence of the school, and then could go back to the tribe with the inspiration they would receive there, I believe that in that way we could lift that whole nation of thirty thousand souls speedily out of barbarism—more speedily, certainly, than we could do through the instrumentality of the schools as they now exist. Meanwhile, however, let us uphold those schools until we are ready to do something better.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has only to examine the testimony accumulated by the committee to which the gentleman from Arkansas has referred to satisfy himself that the evidence is simply overwhelming that the education of these Indians ought to be provided for on the reservations, not only on account of the children, but on account of the tribes; and beyond that (a consideration which Congress ought by no means to overlook) upon the ground of humanity; for no person can read the testimony of some of the Christian men and women who have given evidence before that committee without being convinced of the real grief and distress inflicted upon these unfortunate Indians by taking their children to these remote schools. I have heretofore mentioned an instance of an old Indian woman traveling 75 miles to see her little girl at school; and as soon as she saw her—saw that she was well and contented—she was ready to return to her home. When we are able to furnish ample industrial schools on these reservations, and when good men and women are willing to go there and teach the Indian youth, I do not think we should, in our zeal for Indian education, go to the extent of inflicting suffering upon the parents by removing their children so far from them. I appreciate all that has been done at Carlisle, Hampton, and these other institutions; but I know it is a mistaken philanthropy that takes the Indian youth away from the reservations to educate them.

Mr. ADAMS, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he refers simply to the objection of the Indians to having their children taken away without their consent?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not entirely; for if they are taken away that is inevitable, absolutely inevitable.

Mr. CUTCHEON. In the letter of Captain Pratt, of which I read a portion, he states positively that never in a single instance within his knowledge has any Indian child been taken from the reservation by duress.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not now the question I am discussing. My friend knows I do not want to press that point as to how the children are taken from the reservations; it is a subject I have said very little about except in a general way. All I ask is that my friend read the testimony which has been taken. I have received a letter from Mrs. Cox, one of the estimable ladies engaged in this industrial Indian school at the Lincoln Institute. I see this excellent lady appreciates one of the troubles. Children are brought together from the various tribes, and they do not go back, after being educated, to the same places. The boys and girls thus educated do not, when they grow up, intermarry. No foundation for real progress is laid. This lady, who writes an excellent letter, says that in her judgment the children from a single tribe should be drawn together—not taken one here and one there from this and that tribe. You will find at Hampton or Carlisle children from a great number of the tribes. From the very nature of the tribal relations intermarriage of these pupils is generally impossible. If you will examine the testimony of these various educators who have worked among the Indians, you will find that in their view the proper policy is to educate the boys and girls of a given tribe in the same or contiguous schools, and when they grow up to encourage them to intermarry, to settle down together; then they become mutually supporting; then the farm is established, and civilization goes on. But on the subject referred to I ask the Clerk to read a passage from evidence embraced in the report of the commission on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Isaac M. Taylor, agent of Sac and Fox and other tribes of Indians, testified as follows:

Q. What progress are these Indians making in education since you have been here?

A. The progress made at the school does not amount to a great deal; from the fact that when they get a child learned anything, so they can do something, they take them off to the school at Chilocco, Carlisle, and other Indian schools; they have a number of scholars at all these schools.

Q. Were these scholars generally taken from the schools at this agency?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the object in moving these children from the school at this agency to these other institutions?

A. My opinion has been that it is because they get $175 a head, and it don't make any difference whether they are boys or girls. I don't know what else could do it, for they take them before they are the proper age.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman who gives that testimony was long the agent at the Sac and Fox agency. He is from Kansas and is said to be a gentleman of very high character—is known, I believe, to my friend before me [Mr. RYAN]. The children are taken from these local industrial boarding schools, of which there are seventy-nine in all on the reservations, and transported to these remote institutions, greatly to the distress of the parents and contrary to the desire of the tribes. If the proposition of the gentleman from New York be carried out, that no part of this money be expended in taking children away from the reservation except with the consent of the parents, I do not apprehend that the proposition of my friend from Arkansas is specially important. I think that if this matter were left to the parents, the children, and the tribes themselves these children would be educated on the reservation.

I wish to publish as part of my remarks a statement of the number of these schools on the reservations, together with the excellent letter of Mrs. Cox, to which I have referred.

Mr. LONG. As I understand the gentleman from Indiana does not think the proposition of the gentleman from Arkansas important.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not consider it specially important if the other proposition is carried into effect, as I hope it will be. Yet, at the same time, I think this amendment ought to be adopted.

The letter and statement referred to by Mr. HOLMAN are as follows:

LINCOLN INSTITUTION (INDIAN DEPARTMENT),
No. 324 SOUTH ELEVENTH STREET,
Philadelphia, March 16, 1886.

MY DEAR JUDGE: I understand that there is to be a discussion in the House in regard to the Indian schools East. I trespass upon your well-known courtesy to say a few words about our especial work. After talking to you in regard to the usefulness of these Eastern schools, and learning from you that on their return so many, if not all, returned to their wild condition, we determined to fill up our vacancies as far as possible from one tribe, so that on their return they could strengthen each other. It seems to me a wrong policy has been heretofore pursued in taking a few from each tribe, as it is perfectly natural that one or two returning home could not stand the pressure brought upon them to return to their old ways. Eastern education has only had a trial of five years. The experience of our school is, that being in a large city our children have absorbed civilization, and with a large body returning home together, as they will, the influence and pressure would be greater for civilization than for a savage life. At other Eastern schools they live and see only Indians to a great extent. In our school they are surrounded at all times with the best of white people. I trust these points will have sufficient weight with you to allow us to retain our pupils and give us a chance to test the work from our standpoint.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

MARY McHENRY COX

Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN.

BOARDING SCHOOLS ON RESERVATIONS.

Agency boarding-schools on reservations.—These schools are organized and entirely supported by the Government. There is no special appropriation or allotment for these schools. The average attendance and the cost can not be determined until the end of the fiscal year. The attendance and cost of this class of schools during the last fiscal year will be found in the fourth annual report of the Indian school superintendent, Table C, pages 134 to 139, inclusive. The following is the list of such schools at the present time:

Name of agency	No. of schools.	Name of agency.	No. of schools.
Blackfeet agency	1	Omaha and Winnebago agency	2
Cheyenne and Arapaho agency	2	Osage agency	2
Cheyenne River agency	1	Pima and Maricopa agency	1

Nisqually and S'Kokomish agency	3

The schools at Fort Berthold and Fort Hall agencies have recently been separated from the control of the agents and made independent schools under supervision of bonded superintendents.

Contract boarding-schools on reservations.—These schools are established by religious associations, under authority of the Secretary of the Interior, the religious associations contracting to educate, clothe, feed, and care for the pupils. The Devil's Lake school contracts to furnish teachers and school materials only. The following is a list of such schools:

*Rate per capita per annum.

The schools at Albuquerque and Santa Fé, N. Mex., though not on reservations, are classed with these schools, for the reason that they report to the agent in the same manner as the other schools.

At the following agencies there are schools supported partly by Government and partly by religious associations:

Cheyenne and Arapaho	2
Cheyenne River	1
Santee and Flandreau	2
Yankton	1

There may be other mission schools on reservations, but the above are all that have reported to this office. Efforts are now being made to ascertain if there are other schools of this character.

There is one school on a reservation for which a special appropriation of $22,500 has been made for the present fiscal year, the industrial school at Flathead agency, on the basis of $150 per capita per annum.

BOARDING SCHOOLS NOT ON RESERVATIONS.

The following is "a list of boarding-schools or colleges off of the reservations in which Indian children are admitted," and the number allotted to each during the current fiscal year, at the rate of $150 per capita per annum. These are paid from the appropriation allowing children to be so placed, at a sum not exceeding $167 per annum. (See Indian appropriation bill.)

TRAINING-SCHOOLS.

The following statement gives a list of the Indian boarding-schools entirely under the control of Government off of the reservations and the amount of money appropriated for each this fiscal year; also the cost of each school during the last fiscal year:

School and location.	Cost last fiscal year.	Appropriation for fiscal year 1885–'86.
Carlisle training-school, Carlisle, Pa	$79,852	$81,000
Chilocco training-school, Chilocco, Ind. T	33,000	34,125
Forest Grove training-school, Salem, Oreg	33,160	36,500
Genoa training-school, Genoa, Nebr	27,434	29,750
Haskell Institute, Lawrence, Kans	51,408	66,250

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. To my mind the difficulty about this Indian bill is that the wrong gentlemen were appointed on the Committee on Indian Affairs. There seem to be two committees of this kind in the House—the de jure committee, appointed by the Speaker under the rules, and the de facto committee, which is self-appointed, of which the chairman is my learned friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]. In other words, the Indian commission of which he is chairman ought to have been the Committee on Indian Affairs, and then everything would have been lovely and pleasant here.

I must complain that my friend from Indiana has not treated us fairly in this matter. For twenty-two years he has been a member of this House; for a great many years he has favored just this kind of legislation. My friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has, I think, been here some fourteen or sixteen years. We have been following quietly in the track of these gentlemen, and the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. WELLBORN] and myself, with our colleagues on the Committee on Indian Affairs, have been flattering ourselves that we would certainly please the gentleman from Indiana (knowing his economical turn of mind) in reporting this bill, which appropriates less money than the bill of last year. But these selfish gentlemen of this de facto committee seem to have hidden their light under a bushel. They carefully reserved their report until nearly a month after the Indian appropriation bill was reported to the House, and they allowed the general debate upon the bill to close before they ever saw fit to let the light of their knowledge shine upon the House. I think that is not fair.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from Pennsylvania will allow me a moment. It is very true that the report of this commission ought to have been made earlier; but a portion of the testimony had to be sent back to General Crook, whose evidence had been taken, in order to settle a point upon which we differed. The testimony was printed and the report submitted to the House just as soon as the communication from General Crook, correcting his testimony, was received.

Mr. STORM. That is all right, Mr. Chairman; but still one gentleman [Mr. PEEL] who was a member of this de facto committee, happened also to be upon the Committee on Indian Affairs; and I think it was not fair for that gentleman to shut out of view all this tremendous knowledge which had been acquired by the commission, because, Mr. Chairman, if the Indian learns by absorption in contact with civilization as fast as this committee learns by absorption in contact with the Indians, all I can say is that the Indians can be civilized in about two years and a half; for this little trip into the Indian country has had the effect of inducing these gentlemen to come in and ask us to reverse all they have done heretofore and all that this House has been doing for fifteen or twenty years under the lead of my friend from Indiana. We have this result, simply because these gentlemen in contact with Indian civilization for a month or so have absorbed such a vast amount of knowledge on this subject that really it makes us all feel ashamed of our ignorance.

Mr. Chairman, our legislation on this subject, as well as on many others, shows that we are unwilling to wait long enough to see the results of legislation which has been already enacted. We sow the seed but do not wait for the harvest.

The Lincoln Institute at Philadelphia is not yet three years old; and not a single graduate has gone out from that school, although it has been reported that pupils have gone back from these schools to their barbarous habits of life.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. NELSON. I will yield for five minutes longer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STORM. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the allegation that these Indians are kidnaped and taken away from their parents by these schools, I am here to deny it. The Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia is under a written contract with the parents of these Indians to keep these scholars, not for three years, as is the case with many of the schools, but for five years. And if you now strike down this school, you will leave these persons engaged in the education of these Indians with some one hundred and fifty or two hundred of them upon their hands, because they have contracts with the parents of these Indians to keep them during a five years' course.

Mr. PEEL. This amendment does not interfere with any of those now in attendance.

Mr. STORM. I understand that this is but the entering-wedge by which the whole system is to be overthrown. I understand the craftiness of these men and why the attack has been made on this school, which has done as much for the cause of civilization as any other agency. These Friends—because the Lincoln Institution is in the control of Friends, or Quakers—have been engaged for more than a century in the effort to educate the Indians. They contributed money, erected schoolhouses, and sent teachers to them before the Government ever appropriated a single dollar for that purpose. Yet this system is to be directly struck at in the Lincoln and similar institutions, by saying they shall have no more pupils hereafter upon whom to bring the influences of this civilizing agency.

I say that it is unjust and undeserved. And I can not conceive what my friend from Arkansas is at, unless the education of Indian children is such a profitable thing that he wants the whole of it. [Laughter.]

Now the superintendent of Indian schools has reported that it costs less per capita to educate children at these contract schools than where the Government undertakes the education of these Indian children.

Mr. PERKINS. If my friend will remember, he will recall that we only pay $167 per capita at Hampton.

Mr. STORM. It is $167 at Hampton. In a previous paragraph there is an appropriation of $40,000 at Salem, Oreg., where they have two hundred pupils, precisely the number at Lincoln Institution, and yet the amount appropriated for the Lincoln Institution is $33,400; a difference of over $7,000 in favor of the Lincoln Institution for the same number of pupils. I know it is said there is something appropriated for the completion of buildings at the Salem school. Lincoln Institution provides its own building. Besides, at Salem it costs the Government $500 for a superintendent. The Lincoln Institute furnishes its own superintendent and its own teachers. Let me read what Colonel Oberly, superintendent of Indian schools, says:

> Six contract day-schools cost the Government $2,960.
> It appears that the cost per capita per month of maintaining and educating a pupil at a Government school is considerably greater than the cost of maintaining and educating a pupil at a contract school. In explanation of this fact it is suggested that the Government does not pay to a contract school the entire cost of a pupil's maintenance and education. The machinery of contract schools is not supplied for the exclusive purpose of maintaining and educating Indian children. The machinery of such schools is usually supplied for other educational, or for benevolent, purposes. The education of Indian children, under contract with the Government, is generally undertaken either for the purpose of filling a school to its capacity or for benevolent reasons. The Government does not, therefore, pay to these "contract schools" the entire cost of maintaining and educating a pupil. It merely helps the school by contributing a part of the cost of supporting and instructing the Indian children who are placed under contract at such a school.

Mr. CUTCHEON. At the Eastern schools the education goes on for twelve months in the year, while upon the reservation it is only for ten months in the year, and then the children go back to their tribes.

Mr. STORM. That is so; and taken in connection with the fact that the per capita cost is less at the contract schools than at the Government schools, it passes my comprehension how the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has been induced to take the position he has. The appropriation that has been annually made by the Government for the last five or six years for the support of this class of schools is one of the most humane attempts of the Government for the civilization of the Indian. I hope this House will defeat the attempt now made to thwart that humane purpose.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to say only a word or two touching this matter. I am in sympathy with the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL]. I do not know that I can say anything more to-day than I said when I had the floor a few days ago; and I will not attempt to resay now what I said then.

The gentleman from Michigan read a telegram from Captain Pratt, the superintendent of the Carlisle school. I have looked over that telegram, and I have been somewhat amazed at some of its statements. Here is one statement:

> Scarcely a student but is able to take care of himself or herself among civilized people at the end of their five years' course.

Then let them stay among civilized people.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But you lose their influence upon the tribe.

Mr. CANNON. Let us see what the tribe loses. Let us come to another part of the letter and see what Captain Pratt says in his telegram printed in the RECORD. In speaking of the condition of Indian children at Carlisle as compared with their condition on reservations he says:

> And surrounded by civilization, that feeling is broken up and we educate in loyalty to the Government and individual manhood, which would continue and grow on to perfection in proper soil. Citizenship and industry are the great influences here, while, per contra, there is no place in the United States where citizenship and industry are at a greater discount than upon an Indian reservation.

So say I, and yet you may read the letter through and it does not accord very well. I say with the gentleman from Indiana that these people had better be educated upon the reservations. While they will not get so much education, they are able to better hold what they do get.

Again, I admit that these schools have some good influences; but it has not been upon the Indians. Here is the whole story, contained in a letter from Mr. Herbert Welsh, a most excellent gentleman, I understand, in an article furnished to the New York Tribune, an extract from which I will read.

He says:

> To them—the Eastern schools—perhaps more than any other cause is due the great improvement in public sentiment on the Indian question.

Now, I think that is probably true; but how much longer are we to continue bringing these Indian children one or two thousand miles from their homes to educate them in Eastern schools at an annual expenditure of four or five hundred thousand dollars? Not for the best interests of the Indian children, but to improve and mold public sentiment among white people on the Indian question.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], which prohibits the expenditure of money for the transportation or subsistence of Indian children off the reservation unless they are there by the consent of their parents, renders the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas unnecessary, for I am satisfied the parents will not consent unless under duress. It is true there is no penalty for coercing the parents' consent—as it will be recollected an amendment fixing a penalty, offered by the gentleman from New York, was kept off the bill by a point of order made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS]. Yet I feel quite sure that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs will see that the money is not expended unlawfully, and that the accounting officers of the Treasury—as is their duty—will see that the accounts are not approved unless the expenditures are made in conformity with law, not only in form, but in substance.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CANNON. I have but a moment longer.

Mr. CUTCHEON. A simple question in this connection.

Mr. CANNON. Very well.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Would you strike out the provision for the Eastern schools until you had provided some means of taking care of the Indian children elsewhere?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I would not. I do not wish to take the Indian children now there from Lincoln or Hampton or elsewhere. I would have those to remain who are there; but would not take any others off the reservations for purposes of education. That is my point, and the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas accomplishes by direct provision what I believe the amendment of the gentleman from New York will accomplish in fact.

Now, a word in response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] on the Indian Committee. I know, Mr. Chairman, the fact that local influences are strong upon members of this House. What our constituents want, whether with reference to the education of Indian children or anything else, we are very apt to feel a considerable interest in granting.

But I will say to the gentleman that when he stated his committee had followed the lead of the gentleman from Indiana and myself in preparing the bill he is a little unfortunate that he did not follow a little closer that leadership. We think we have found a better way for the education of these children, and if, while he is following, he would but pay the compliment to follow a little closer in our footsteps it would probably be better for all parties.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard for a few moments at this point. I did not design to say a word upon the bill just here in this connection, but as my colleague [Mr. STORM] of the Committee on Indian Affairs has made some very just remarks in reference to the Lincoln Institution at Philadelphia, I think it proper that I should say what I intended to say later on at this time, for if the amendment which is proposed shall be adopted in connection with this paragraph of the bill, I presume that a similar amendment will be offered to each paragraph relating to schools, while if it be defeated the same amendment will not be offered again.

I want to say here, and I say it with a full knowledge of the fact, that no one connected with the Lincoln Institution has ever sought to have these children brought from the Indian reservations for education there.

Mr. PERKINS. Against their will.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Of course I mean brought against their will or the consent of their parents. Kidnaped has been the term used by some in the heat of debate. And moreover I know it to be a fact that there are applications from the parents of Indian children to permit them to come to that school, but that can not be done on account of the meagerness of the appropriations, although there are sufficient accommodations for more scholars. Why, sir, that institution is complete in its arrangements for successful teaching. I do not say it is any better than Hampton in Virginia; I do not say that the education is better than the education that is given at Carlisle, but the good influences in educating these Indian children at that school are greater and more diversified, necessarily so, in a city containing a million and more of population, replete with educational institutions, where are exhaustless means of acquiring intelligence and becoming cultured and where knowledge can be gained in countless ways by these children of the forest. In Philadelphia outside the walls of this institution they can see practically all kinds of workmanship, and as mere lookers-on they can not fail to learn what will advance them in any pursuit of industry to which their inclinations may lead them. In this respect the Eastern schools have advantages over those on the reservations.

The amount of $167 has been allowed for the education of each of the children at these schools. That amount of money is not sufficient to support, clothe, and bring them up properly at the Lincoln Institution, but the balance is cheerfully made up when necessary by voluntary contributions of the people of Philadelphia, largely from the Quaker population, to whom my colleague has referred. Thousands of dollars are contributed annually by the citizens, who have entire confidence in the directors of this institution. There are separate buildings, one of them in the city for the girls, the other within the city limits, but in a semi-rural location, for the boys. The facilities for acquiring education are alike for girls and boys, and equal care is taken of both, everything being supervised by noble women, whose time is given voluntarily, as well as by men, who devote themselves to the cause of Indian education. In the population of a large city such as Philadelphia are to be found warm hearts, willing givers, plenty of instructors, and in these respects also are advantages to the pupils not to be found in sparse communities like the reservations.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have to hurry on, because I know the Committee of the Whole is becoming impatient and wants to close the debate which has continued so many days on this bill. I will say here that so far as the schools on the reservations are concerned there is no doubt that the teaching of the children there should be continued. Good work bearing good fruits has been done in them. But when the children come East they get further into civilization and have better surroundings, for they are entirely away from tribal influences. No one can deny this. Then these Indian children who go out from the Eastern and other located schools educated and return to their reservations are more fitted to teach than if educated nearer their tribes. I say, as has been shown by the testimony read by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], that the proportion of these girls and boys who are educated in the schools for which we are asking appropriations who do well after leaving, and who will eventually make good and useful citizens, is as large as the proportion of the pupils of any schools in any community anywhere to be found.

I will relate an incident that occurred among the Indian girls of the Lincoln Institution. In one of our public school sections some of these children have been permitted to enter as scholars. The highest prize taken in that section was taken by an Indian girl, and there were others standing equally in their classes with the other children, children of our own citizens. The capacity of receiving education by Indian children is surprising. A few years more will show clearly the advancement made by them, if Congress will pursue the same policy in appropriating money as in the last four or five years.

This amendment means the destruction of these schools, and the members of this committee know it very well. A test of four or five years only is not sufficient. Let us wait a few more years. What has been done in this short time proves the advantage of educating children both in the East and on the reservations. I ask the members of the Committee of the Whole whether they are going to permit themselves to vote down these appropriations and be controlled in their action because a few children have gone to the tribal relation, when it appears by evidence in letters and in reports that the large proportion of these scholars return to their reservations ready to teach, ready to work, and illustrating by their industry, intelligence, and good conduct the effects of having been taught in schools established by Congressional appropriations? The country is not ready to have that blow struck now. This committee I am sure will vote the money.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I call the attention of the committee back to the practical question here involved. I regard it as very practical, and one which it is important should be considered. This discussion has gone off on the comparative merits of this system of education on the reservation or at these schools. I understand a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs has offered an amendment that so far as the Hampton school is concerned no further contract shall be made, but the money appropriated by this bill shall be applied to the education only of the children now under contract to be educated at that school. I regard this as an important amendment, and one that ought to be adopted by this House.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. O'NEILL] says this is an experiment of only three or four years, and that it has not had sufficient time to be fairly tried. In answer to that statement I have only to refer to what was said by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON], and the testimony he brought here from various parties who have had experience in these matters, which shows that the best system of education is on the reservation, and not at these schools. If you take every word the gentleman has said in opposition to the amendments it furnishes the strongest argument that can be used in its favor.

It would be perfectly clear to every practical mind that where these children are educated out among their own people, surrounded by the immediate influences of their own homes, it must be better for them to be educated there than at these Eastern schools. But the great objection has been pointed out by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and has been alluded to by other gentlemen, that you do not take these children from one tribe and educate those of one tribe, say, at Carlisle, those of another at Lincoln, those of another at the Hampton Institute; but you take one from one place and another from another, so that you have them gathered from different portions of the frontier and the Indian country. The result is when they leave the schools they go home and are scattered. They have not the influence one upon the other that is contemplated by this system.

I am not disposed to consume the time of the committee, but while I am up I desire to say no greater wrong was ever perpetrated on the Indians than this kidnaping of children, of which the proof is ample, to bring them to these distant schools. No greater cruelty has ever been inflicted on anybody than has been inflicted under this system. Not alone to that do I object, but I object to the extravagance of this system of education when the money might be applied much more usefully in another direction. I do not agree with my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and other gentlemen that the best system or the only system that can be devised for the education of these children is their education on the reservations at these day schools. I think that is a mistake, but I am willing these schools should be continued and that the effort should still be made to educate them in that way. But I believe the greatest good to be attained in our efforts to educate the Indians would be by doing it under the direction of the different Christian denominations of this country. Let them go there and be encouraged by the Government. Let them take some of the money that is being thrown away under the system we have been pursuing for years and that might as well be burned up, and let us encourage these religious denominations to establish churches and schools upon the reservations, and you will soon attain a far greater good than has hitherto been accomplished.

Mr. WELLBORN. Mr. Chairman, if no one else is pressing for the attention of the House it is hardly necessary that the committee rise, and I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. PEEL], which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 1048 add:

"Provided, No part of the amount hereby appropriated shall be used to educate any Indian pupil not now enrolled and in actual attendance at said school."

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For support and education of three hundred and fifty Indian pupils, at $175 per annum each, at the Indian school at Lawrence, Kans., $61,250; pay of superintendent of schools, $2,000; purchase of material and erection of shops, cottages, outbuildings and necessary repairs, $3,000; in all, $68,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at that point, which I will send to the desk to be read.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out of line 1055 the words "three thousand," before the word "dollars," and insert in lieu thereof "four thousand seven hundred and fifty."

Mr. PERKINS. In explanation of this amendment I wish to say that it does not increase the aggregate amount agreed upon by the committee. In printing the bill an error was made which renders this amendment necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. My point is that it is not authorized by any existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make the point of order on the entire paragraph?

Mr. THROCKMORTON. Yes, sir; on the entire paragraph.

Mr. PERKINS. If the Chair will observe, he will see that the language of the paragraph shows that the appropriation is to continue schools now existing. Hence, the appropriation is for the continuation of an object now in existence, and for that reason I urge that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the phraseology of the rule in regard to appropriations in continuation of public works and objects already in progress does not apply to a provision of this character. If the Chair has the rule before him he will see from its language that it can have no application to such an appropriation as this. It applies, for instance, to a public building or to a ship, where the work is begun but not completed. In such cases it has always been held necessarily, upon grounds of public policy, that where the work has been entered upon appropriations for continuing it may properly be made, and against such appropriations the point of order can not be made. But the Chair will perceive that if a provision authorizing an appropriation such as this can escape the operation of the point of order, then the rule has no application to an appropriation for anything that has been provided for by any previous appropriation bill, either in the current year or a preceding year.

Mr. LONG. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana whether this appropriation is not somewhat in the nature of an appropriation for carrying out treaty stipulations in regard to the education of the Indians?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, no. If it were for that purpose, there would be no trouble about it. All the money required to carry out the treaty stipulations with the Indians is provided for specifically in other places in the bill. The term "objects" in the rule, as the Chair will perceive, is synonymous with the word "works," used in that connection where the rule speaks of the continuation of public works or objects.

Mr. LONG. It is broader than the word "works."

Mr. HOLMAN. It is manifestly synonymous with "works," when the history of the rule is considered. This provision in the rule sprang up out of the necessity for continuing appropriations for works, such as ships or public improvements already begun.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] whether there is any law at all or any treaty obligation to provide for educating the Indians?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, yes; any number of them.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Very well. It matters not at all whether there was an appropriation for this institution in the last appropriation bill; it does not matter whether we appropriated five thousand or fifty thousand in that appropriation bill; if there is a law on the statute-book authorizing provision for the education of the Indians, then it is for this Congress in making appropriations to direct how they shall be expended, to what objects they shall be devoted, how much for this and how much for that, and this not by virtue of the appropriation bill of last year, which confessedly, so far as it makes appropriations, expires with the fiscal year. An appropriation bill may carry independent and permanent legislation with it. That is true, and when the appropriations expire the permanent portion of the bill floats away, so to speak, and becomes a part of the general law. That legislation becomes permanent. But the point is this: while nothing becomes law, in this general sense, simply because it is in an appropriation bill, still if there is a general law, then it is for this House or this Congress to determine how much shall be appropriated to carry it into effect and how the appropriation shall be expended. For instance, any of the Departments might have had last year provision made for twenty first-class clerks and ten second-class clerks; this year we may appropriate for twenty-five first-class clerks and fifteen second-class clerks, and the Department can employ that number. But, on the other hand, we may cut down the appropriation for clerks to fifteen altogether. Then the Department can employ but fifteen. I think there is no difficulty about drawing the line. We can appropriate more or less, much or little. We may go further. We may direct to what specific objects the money shall be applied. We may carry out an appropriation bill into details, and say to whom the money shall be paid. For instance, I hold that it would be in order to provide that any particular individual should be paid a given sum. That would not bind the Department to appoint the individual, but the money so appropriated could be paid to no one else. That is on the theory that this House holds the purse-strings, controls the appropriations of the public money, and may direct to what specific purposes they shall be applied regardless of previous appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] to the fact that by this bill the provisions of every treaty in regard to education are carried out.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But how much we shall appropriate to carry them out is a question for this House to decide.

Mr. HOLMAN. Every treaty stipulation contemplates the expenditures of money for the education or civilization of Indians on the reservations. This is true without a single exception. We never made a treaty in which the expenditure of money for education was not to be on the reservation. We never could have made a treaty with an Indian tribe in any part of our public domain with a stipulation that the expenditure was to be elsewhere than on the reservation. Such a thing has never been thought of. We appropriate in this bill every dollar required for education under treaty stipulations; and in addition to that we provide that outside of the reservations—entirely beyond them, in the Territories and States—$50,000 shall be expended. I have no objection to this expenditure of $50,000 in addition to the $700,000. It is not the expenditure of money that I am concerning myself about; but I do not wish an expenditure to be made contrary to the spirit in which we have treated with these Indian tribes, contrary to the spirit of all the treaties. There is no law, of course, for this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read clause 3 of Rule XXI.

The Clerk read as follows:

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress; nor shall any provision changing existing law be in order in any general appropriation bill or in any amendment thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair also asks the Clerk to read the provision of the law for the current year on this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care, support, and education of Indian pupils at industrial, agricultural, mechanical, or other schools other than those herein provided for in any of the States or Territories of the United States, at a rate not to exceed $167 for each pupil, $83,500. And wherever the word "children" or "child" occurs in that part of the act making appropriations for the Indian service for the fiscal year 1885, approved July 4, 1884, under the heading "Support of schools," it shall be construed to include all Indians of whatever age that may have been or are pupils in any of the institutions herein provided for.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will also have read from one of the Indian treaties a paragraph which is similar to the provision contained in many of the other treaties made by the United States with the Indians.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the United States agrees that for every thirty children between said ages who can be induced or compelled to attend school a house shall be provided and a teacher competent to teach the elementary branches of an English education shall be furnished, who will reside among said Indians, and faithfully discharge his or her duties as a teacher. The provisions of this article to continue for not less than twenty years.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be observed by the committee that under the rule no appropriation not previously authorized by law is in order except "in continuation of appropriations for such public works or objects as are already in progress," &c. That the education of the Indians has been entered upon and is in progress will not, the Chair supposes, be denied by any one. The provision just read from one of the treaties and similar provisions contained in other treaties have for their object the education of Indian children.

Mr. HOLMAN. On the reservation.

The CHAIRMAN. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the Chair will state that there is nothing in the clause under discussion that precludes the use of the funds thereby appropriated for the education of children exclusively on the reservation. The Chair thinks that this is an appropriation in continuation of an object already in progress. School-houses have been built, books bought, and libraries and laboratories furnished, and the education progressed for years. It is also in pursuance of treaty stipulations, which, to say the least, have the force and effect of law.

In this connection the Chair will have reread the clause against which the point of order is made.

The Clerk read as follows:

For care, support, and education of three hundred Indian pupils at industrial, agricultural, mechanical, or other schools, other than those herein provided for in any of the States or Territories of the United States, at a rate not to exceed $167 for each pupil, $50,100.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be observed that there is nothing in this proposition requiring the money spent otherwise than according to the treaties entered into and "in continuation of such * * * objects as are already in progress;" nor can the Chair in ruling presume it will be otherwise used. The Chair does not think the case is similar to that decided by the committee yesterday relative to the allowance to Capt. R. H. Pratt.

The point of order is not well taken, and is overruled.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. WELLBORN. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it be passed with the amendments which have been agreed upon.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, and with a recommendation that it be passed as amended.

Mr. WELLBORN. I ask the previous question on the amendments and on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. If no separate vote on the amendments be asked, the question will be taken upon them in gross.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WELLBORN. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. On the passage of this bill the rules require the yeas and nays to be taken.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 227, nays 5, not voting 91; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL said: Mr. Speaker, I was not present when my name was called and ask leave to vote.

The SPEAKER. That can not be done under the rules.

Mr. TIMOTHY J. CAMPBELL. If I had been present, I would have voted in the affirmative.

Under the rules the following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk:

The following members were announced as paired on this vote:

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri, with Mr. PETTIBONE.

Mr. PINDAR with Mr. PAYSON.

Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. MILLARD.

Mr. NEECE with Mr. GILFILLAN.

Mr. ELLSBERRY with Mr. GALLINGER, for this day.
Mr. FORAN with Mr. MORROW.
Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. THOMPSON.
Mr. WISE with Mr. CUTCHEON.
Mr. DAWSON with Mr. STRUBLE.
Mr. DINGLEY with Mr. DUNN.
Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, with Mr. PAYNE.

The following gentlemen were announced as paired on all political questions until further notice:

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. STEPHENSON.
Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. NEGLEY.
Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.
Mr. HALE with Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.
Mr. SKINNER with Mr. MORRILL.
Mr. ST. MARTIN with Mr. HOUK.
Mr. IRION with Mr. PLUMB.
Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. MILLIKEN.
Mr. BENNETT with Mr. MCKENNA.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HEPBURN.
Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. LOUTTIT.
Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. VAN SCHAICK, on all questions until March 31.
Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. DAVENPORT, on all political questions until March 25.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I move to amend the title of the bill by inserting after the word "eighty-seven" the words "also eliminating Captain Pratt, and for other purposes." I make this motion simply for the purpose of saying that we have passed the bill precisely as it came from the committee, with the exception that we have eliminated Captain Pratt's name, with his appropriation, from the bill. And I desire to read in that connection a telegram received from Captain Pratt on Friday last, in which he says:

In addition to the $1,000 I told you of in the letter, I have received this morning a check for $5,000, from a friend in New York, to pay the $4,200 still due on school-farm and other purposes. You will remember that I appealed to Congress three years to give $20,000 for a school-farm, and was annually refused. I then bought the farm for $20,000, and it is now paid for without Government aid.

R. H. PRATT,
Captain and Superintendent.

The other thousand dollars he speaks of he received from a friend in Philadelphia on Thursday last for the benefit of this school.

This is the man, Captain Pratt, who is eliminated from the bill by the action of the Committee of the Whole of this House, a man who within the last five years, by his individual exertions, has raised $51,000 for the benefit of the Carlisle school; and I think it is pretty good to eliminate such a man by the action of this House. I wish the House had a little earlier discovered that it was hardly proper to legislate a man into office by name. They appear now to have discovered it for the first time; and this is the result: A man who stands in the foremost ranks of Indian education, who has by his individual exertions secured contributions amounting to $51,000 for his school, $6,000 of it in the last seven days, is eliminated by the action of this House. That being the case, is it not proper that the title of the bill should show that fact?

Mr. RANDALL. He has not been hurt. He can be employed now under this bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is proper to state that there was no reference to the merits of the case upon the question presented. No imputation rests upon the gentleman by reason of that action of the House.

Mr. CUTCHEON. I withdraw the amendment.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Speaker, before going into Committee of the Whole I think out of abundant caution that all points of order had better be reserved.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The Clerk will read the title of the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, the bill which the Committe on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have reported to the House recommends an appropriation of $54,326,588.07. The estimates made by the Department for the expenditures of the Post-Office Department for the next year are $54,986,166.89. The committee recommend the appropriation of $659,578.82 less than the estimates of the Department, and an increase over the bill containing the appropriations for the current fiscal year of $625,598.07.

It is known to every one that there is an annual increase in the expenditures of the postal service of the Government. No person familiar with that service, certainly no gentleman on the floor of this House, would expect such an economical administration of this great service as would bring about a reduction of the expenditures in 1887 over the expenditures for the year 1886. It is necessarily an increasing expenditure, as the service constantly grows.

Now, sir, it may be wondered by one who has not closely examined the details of this bill that the increased recommendations for the next year are not greater as compared with the amount appropriated for the current fiscal year. The reason that this increase is so small occurs from several causes. The principal one lies in the fact that the estimates made for the current fiscal year were entirely too large, and in some instances the Postmaster-General has seen fit to recommend an appropriation less than the appropriation for the current fiscal year. For instance, we will take the compensation of postmasters. The bill for the present fiscal year provides an expenditure of $12,300,000. The amount estimated is $12,000,000. The amount recommended for the next year is $11,700,000. So far as can be ascertained from the report of the Sixth Auditor with reference to the appropriations for the current fiscal year for the compensation of postmasters, it is believed that it will amount to about $1,000,000 more than will be expended; so that it will be readily seen that an estimate of $12,000,000 could very easily be made, being $300,000 less than for the current fiscal year.

Again, sir, in the appropriation for the current fiscal year is the sum of $400,000 designed for compensation of American steamers carrying ocean mails beyond what was provided for under sea and inland postage, and reduction occurs there by an omission on the part of the committee to make any similar recommendation in this bill. On the other hand, the bill for the current year provides $14,010,000 for transportation by railroad routes. The bill as recommended by the committee for the next fiscal year carries $15,595,000 for the same purpose. The increase recommended for next year over the appropriation bill for this year is $1,585,000. The increase, as appears by this comparison, is extremely large, almost unprecedented. It comes about by the fact that the appropriation for railway mail transportation for the current year was below the needs of the service many hundreds of thousands of dollars.

I have cited two or three items simply as illustrations, with no purpose of undertaking to discuss in the general debate the several items, amounting to about thirty-seven, contained in this bill. I prefer to discuss them under the five-minute rule, which is always more satisfactory to the committee.

I should feel bound to take a much longer time in the presentation of this bill in the outset but for the fact that contrary to former usage the bill contains not a single legislative provision in it save two; and of these the committee make this explanation: One relates to an appropriation for special mail facilities which has been in the Post-Office appropriation bills for the last ten years, going out sometimes upon a point of order and reinserted by the Senate and assented to by the House. The committee, although there was no provision of law for special facilities, in view of the long use of those facilities did not feel it was their duty to initiate the movement of striking them from the bill, and thought best to insert the item and to inform the House, so that they might not be charged with any purpose of legislating without the House being fully informed.

Then, again, there is an item for the mail-messenger service, a service which involves the delivery of the mails beyond the eighty rods from the depot to the post-office. This has grown to an enormous sum. The necessities of it are absolute, and the committee have placed it here because from the beginning of the railway service this appropriation has been made.

It can not be dispensed with. The confusion that would arise is so manifest, that the committee thought it best to insert it in the bill, and, as in the other instance, to ask the attention of the House to the fact. It is to be hoped that hereafter legislative provisions will be enacted to avoid any difficulties of this sort. In the report accompanying this bill the committee have called attention to the statutes which authorize all the appropriations contained in it.

With scrupulous care, therefore, we have sought to conform to the will of this House that there should be no legislation on this bill. There is accordingly no occasion for the extent of general debate which the legislative provisions heretofore connected with the appropriation bills have called for. I shall therefore reserve the balance of my time in this general debate, and now move that the committee rise for the purpose of obtaining an order from the House to limit general debate upon the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman makes that motion will he yield to me for a question?

Mr. BLOUNT. Certainly.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice there is a paragraph in which there is recommended an appropriation of $375,000 for transportation of foreign mails. Is the gentleman from Georgia able to inform the House how much of this sum will be required for transportation of mails by foreign steamers and the other incidental charges?

Mr. BLOUNT. Not quite so much as is contained in the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman state about the sum? What I wish to ascertain is how much is recommended by the committee for the transportation of foreign mails by American steamers.

Mr. BLOUNT. The total amount for the transportation of foreign mails is $375,000, and then there is an item of $100,000 for balances due foreign countries.

Mr. DINGLEY. Three hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars is for transportation by foreign steamers, by rail, and by American steamers. How much of this would be required to pay for transportation of the mails by foreign steamers? My object is to ascertain how much will be left for transportation by American steamers.

Mr. BLOUNT. This amount is sufficient to provide for the payment of American steamers for sea and inland transportation of foreign mails and also for the payment of foreign steamers. If my friend will find it as agreeable, when we reach this part of the bill in the five minutes' debate I will have read from the Clerk's desk the estimates as made by the Department.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope there will be no attempt to limit as to the five minutes' debate on this important matter.

Mr. BLOUNT. The gentleman misapprehends my motion. I have not thought of doing that.

The motion of Mr. BLOUNT was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills; and pending that motion, I move that all general debate on the Post-Office appropriation bill now under consideration in Committee of the Whole be limited to six hours.

Mr. BURROWS. I trust the gentleman from Georgia in charge of the bill will not insist upon that motion. It seems a little extraordinary, after being in committee for but a few moments, that the committee should rise and a motion should be made to limit debate to six hours upon an appropriation bill that carries $54,000,000.

A MEMBER. How much time do you want?

Mr. BURROWS. When there are other matters, like the bill for the relief of Fitz-John Porter, that took a week or ten days, it seems in a great appropriation bill like this general debate should not be limited as now proposed.

Of course I speak only for myself, but I think also in a measure for other members of the committee in the minority. Six hours would not even accommodate members of the committee if they all desire to speak, and there are other gentlemen within my knowledge who are quite as familiar with some portions of this bill as the members of the committee themselves, and who desire to be heard. I hope, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] will not prevail, and if he insists upon it I shall move to amend it.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say this about the matter: We have had experience with the Indian appropriation bill as to how much time, under the new rules, these several bills are likely to occupy. We do not get to work at them until about half past 2 o'clock, because the two morning hours consume the best working portion of the day. We have seen what has occurred in connection with the pension bill, and there are three or four appropriation bills now upon the Speaker's table. If we are to gauge the general debate on appropriation bills that are to come by our experience in the past, we need not expect to get away from here until the month of August. The responsibility for that will not rest upon me in connection with this post-office appropriation bill. Gentlemen on this side of the House have thought that four hours will be ample time in which to discuss this bill which has no legislation in it—$54,000,000 of service authorized by law, and, so far as the legitimate provisions in the bill are concerned, not a difference of opinion as to $5,000 in the whole fifty-four millions. I trust, therefore, that the House will second the motion I have made. Of course the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has a right to move to amend it, and whatever the House shall see fit to do I certainly shall conform to with pleasure.

Mr. BURROWS rose, but yielded to Mr. BINGHAM.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I was going to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to allow the general debate to run on to-morrow, and then at the close of to-morrow's session we shall know whether many of the subjects embraced in the bill are to be largely discussed. My own opinion is that there are but two points in the bill that will really provoke debate in this House; one, pertaining to the pay of the railway postal clerks, and the other to what is called the foreign mail service. I think that the gentleman can in that way ascertain the temper of the House and see whether a lengthened debate is desired. I am free to say that while I think six hours is perhaps too limited a time for the full discussion of this bill, I also think that the general debate upon it will not take very much more time than that. As a member of the committee, always taking an earnest interest in postal matters, there are but two provisions in the bill that I would feel disposed to vote against. As to ninety-nine one-hundredths of the bill, the members of the committee are, I may say, unanimous. Therefore I make the suggestion to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] that he let the debate run on to-morrow, and, prior to adjournment to-morrow, fix the limit of general debate.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I have very great respect for my associate on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM], and I would like to adopt his suggestion, but my experience has been that debate begets debate, and I think the House understands that too much time has been taken up already in the general discussion of appropriation bills. I propose to allow the House to say now upon this motion whether the time I propose is too little time or not. If there was any legislative proposition in this bill, if there was anything in it that was not sanctioned by existing law, then I would listen with more disposition to yield to the appeal that has been made. But the fact that members want to speak day in and day out about other matters than those contained in the bill is not to me a sufficient reason for putting upon this side of the House such a responsibility for waste of time as that would involve.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, when I rose a while ago I was about to make to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] the same suggestion that fell from the lips of his colleague on the committee [Mr. BINGHAM], that the debate should go on to-morrow and the limit be fixed at the end of to-morrow's session. But I understand that the gentleman from Georgia declines that. I am therefore compelled to move an amendment to his proposition, so as to make the limit of general debate ten hours instead of six. In that connection I desire to say that although every item of appropriation upon this bill may be in accordance with and in obedience to existing law, it does not therefore follow that there is no item in it that should be discussed.

Mr. BLOUNT. We have the five-minute debate for the discussion of the items.

Mr. BURROWS. We have the five-minute debate for the discussion of other bills, too; but on a bill of this importance it seems to me improper to limit debate as proposed by the gentleman from Georgia. I therefore move to amend his motion by striking out "six" and inserting "ten" before the word "hours."

Mr. HENLEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe the observation of the House will sustain me in the statement that if there be an order made limiting this debate to six hours so that members will know that what they have to say must be said in that time or under the five-minute rule, there will be a fuller attendance and a more business-like and searching debate upon the merits of this bill than if the debate be unlimited. We know this from very recent experience in this House. As the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] says, debate begets debate; a speech made on this side must be answered by a speech on the other side, and so it runs on ad libitum without reference to the merits of the bill. I hope the motion to limit the debate to six hours will prevail.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. BURROWS limiting the debate to ten hours; and there were—ayes 66, noes 72.

Mr. BURROWS. Is that a quorum, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I feel constrained to make the point that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint tellers, and will designate the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BLOUNT] to act as tellers.

Mr. KING. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays; and they were refused—only eight members voting in the affirmative.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 91.

So the amendment of Mr. BURROWS was not agreed to.

The question then recurring upon the motion of Mr. BLOUNT that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the Post-Office appropriation bill be limited to six hours, the motion was agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion that the House again resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

The CHAIRMAN. By order of the House, general debate on this bill is limited to six hours.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, at the opening of the present session, and while the new rules were under discussion, gentlemen on this floor expressed the opinion that the adoption of the new rules would result in an increase of the public expenditures, partly because of a division of responsibility, and partly because of the opportunity which the change of rules would give certain committees to magnify their own importance. The appropiation bills already reported show the apprehensions of those who entertained this opinion to be groundless. In illustration of this position, I desire to call the attention of the House to the appropriation recommended by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and to show by a comparative exhibit of figures taken from the records of the Post-Office Department that the slight increase in the amount now reported by the committee over previous appropriations for the support of this Department of the Government is not only necessary for its proper maintenance, but is also below the usual annual ratio of increase which has heretofore been deemed necessary.

The following tables are herewith submitted, from which it may be readily observed that the average annual increase in the sums appropriated for the use of the Post-Office Department during the period of ten years ending June 30, 1885, has been $1,718,488.92, and the average annual percentage of increase during said period has been 3.9.

In the bill now presented an increase of only $625,599.07, or 1.1 per cent. more than the last appropriation, is recommended, while the figures show an actual reduction of the average annual increase of appropriations of $1,092,889.85, or 2.8 per cent.

A careful examination of the tables submitted will, in my judgment, reveal a prudent economy on the part of the committee, and serve to vindicate in some measure at least the action of the House in the distribution of the appropriation bills made by the adoption of the new rules.

The causes which have led to the annual increase of the sum appropriated for the use of the Post-Office Department are well understood by every member of the House, and call for no explanation from the committee. Much space might be occupied with statistics of the public service performed by this Department, involving disbursements in many channels of expenditure, at once illustrative and corroborative of the steady growth in the public use of the mail service; but a brief reference to the establishment and growth of the free-delivery system and the other systems by which our inland mails are transported will suffice to show at once the necessity for constantly increasing the annual appropriations for their support.

* Decrease. † Excess of revenue over expenditures. ‡ Asked for "railroad transportation." § Average for ten years.

FREE DELIVERY.

The free-delivery system was established in 1863, and at its organization numbered 66 offices, with 685 carriers, and cost, during its first year, $317,061.20. Since then its facilities have been extended in proportion as the rapid development of the country has required them, until to-day its operations include no less than 178 offices, requiring the services of 4,385 carriers, involving an annual expenditure of $3,985,952.50, and yielding to the Government during the last fiscal year a net income of $1,295,768.55.

INLAND MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

The mails of the United States are carried by railroads, steamboats, and star routes.

In 1837 there were 974 miles of railroads, which carried the mails at a cost to the Government of $307,444. During the last year 121,032 miles of railway were engaged in the transportation of the mails at a compensation aggregating $15,267,550.25; 11,997 miles of steamboat lines performed like service at a cost of $558,288.51, while 232,222 miles of star service cost $5,403,259. To these amounts must be added the pay of forty-three hundred and eighty-seven railway postal clerks, amounting to $4,246,209.51 and $366,139.70 for mail messengers; $515,725.83 for fast mails and incidentals; and we have a grand total of annual expenditures for inland mail transportation of $26,877,172.80. These vast agencies have not been called into existence to foster any false theories of progress, but have only followed in the wake of the locomotive as it in turn has followed the star of empire westward, drawing a nation in its train.

The figures speak for themselves, and indicate more than one feature of the rapid advancement of our country in the numerous achievements which engage the attention and reward the enterprise of civilized nations. And so long as we shall be permitted to follow our traditional policy of peaceful progress so long may our people expect to enjoy a continued increase of their material prosperity, and so long will their enlightened public spirit continue to indorse such increased expenditures as the preservation and expansion of their common interests may demand.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, the sums appropriated for the various objects mentioned in this bill are in the main sufficient for the needs of the service. The amount estimated by the Postmaster-General as necessary to the proper administration of the affairs of the Post-Office Department for the next fiscal year is $54,986,166.89. The amount which this bill carries is $54,326,588.07; in other words, the appropriation is less than the estimate by the sum of $659,578.82.

If the estimates as furnished by the Post-Office Department are correct, the bill is wrong. There is no reason why the appropriations for the support of the Government in its various branches should not be commensurate with the demands of the service. Deficiency bills, unless they cover some unforeseen expenditures, ought not to be encouraged. Appropriations ought to be sufficient to cover all knowable expenditures, and when an appropriation is clearly much less than the sum estimated to be necessary to meet the demands of the service the reduction must be made either because the House lacks confidence in the estimates submitted, or else the appropriation is reduced for political reasons. There may be some party advantage in reducing an appropriation below the estimates on the eve of an election, and after the election supplying the needs of the service by a deficiency bill, but such advantage can only be temporary and in the end will retard rather than promote party ends.

There are two items in this bill to which I desire to direct particular attention; and I do so at this time for the reason that under the five-minute debate it would be impossible to give these subjects that consideration which their importance demands. The first item relates to pay of railway postal clerks. The amount estimated as necessary for this service is $4,877,000. The amount appropriated by this bill is $4,800,000, or $77,000 less than the Department declares necessary for the proper administration of this branch of the service. This estimate too, let me say, insufficient as it is, is made upon the basis of an allowance to postal clerks of class 4 a salary of $1,150 per annum, and clerks of class 5 an annual salary of $1,300. I propose to move an amendment to this provision of the bill, when in order, to increase this appropriation sufficiently to enable the Postmaster-General to pay clerks of class 5 $1,400 instead of $1,300, and clerks of class 4 $1,200 instead of $1,150. The amount necessary to be added to this appropriation in order to accomplish this end will be the sum of $90,200.

A word, now, in regard to previous legislation touching the pay of postal clerks of classes 4 and 5. From the organization of the railway postal service until 1874 there were two grades of postal clerks, and they were paid respectively $1,200 and $1,400 per annum. These grades and salaries continued until August, 1876.

Mr. BLOUNT. Does my friend from Michigan mean to say that the distribution of the mails from the beginning was by postal clerks?

Mr. BURROWS. They were not called postal clerks; they were known by a different designation—as route agents. These grades, I say, continued until August, 1876. At that time, when these clerks were receiving $1,200 and $1,400 respectively, their salaries were cut down to $1,150 and $1,300 by reason of an insufficient appropriation, and for no other reason. In proof of this, I read from the report of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service for the year 1876:

> The appropriation for the salaries of railway postal clerks for the year ending June 30, 1877, is $1,225,000, as against an expense for the year ending June 30, 1876, of $1,278,340. This material decrease made it necessary to reduce both the salaries and the force. Head railway post-office clerks' salaries were reduced from $1,400 to $1,300 per annum, and railway postal clerks were reduced from $1,200 to $1,150 per annum.

From this it appears that this reduction was made necessary, as I have stated, by reason of an insufficient appropriation. The Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service recommended in that connection as follows:

> In making estimates for the year ending June 30, 1878, the strong probabilities of the restoration of this service should be considered.

Mr. Vail, the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, in his report for 1877, made the following recommendation touching clerks of classes 4 and 5:

> I can but urge the justice of making the appropriation for this class of employés sufficient to enable the Department to restore them to the old rate of $1,400 per annum for head clerks railway post-offices, and $1,200 per annum for clerks of railway post-offices, and $1,000 and less for assistant clerks, route agents, and mail-route messengers.

This was the recommendation by the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service immediately after the reduction was made by reason of an insufficient appropriation. Yet the recommendation was disregarded and this injustice to these clerks has continued until this hour. On the 31st day of July, 1882, an act was passed "to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service;" which act is as follows:

> An act to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service.
> Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That persons in the railway mail service, known as railway post-office clerks, route agents, local agents, and mail-route messengers, shall, on and after the passage of this act, be designated as railway postal clerks, and divided into five classes, whose salaries shall not exceed the following rates per annum:
> First class, not exceeding $800; second class, not exceeding $900; third class, not exceeding $1,000; fourth class, not exceeding $1,200; and fifth class, not exceeding $1,400: Provided, That the Postmaster-General, in fixing the salaries of clerks in the different classes, may fix different salaries for clerks of the same class, according to the amount of work done and the responsibility incurred by each, but shall not, in any case, allow a higher salary to any clerk of any class than the maximum fixed by this act for the class to which such clerk belongs.
> SEC. 2. That the sums appropriated in the act entitled "An act making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved May 4, 1882, for the compensation of the railway post-office clerks, route agents, mail-route messengers, and local agents, be consolidated into one fund, and applied for the compensation of the clerks embraced in the five classes under the title of railway postal clerks provided in this act.

By the foregoing act it will be observed that fourth-class clerks are to receive an annual salary of not exceeding $1,200, and fifth-class clerks not exceeding $1,400.

This is the provision of law under which the appropriation for the pay of railway postal clerks is made.

In 1884, after the passage of the foregoing act, the general Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service again recommended that a sufficient amount be appropriated to pay clerks of classes 4 and 5 the maximum amount allowed under the law, to wit, $1,200 and $1,400, respectively.

The recommendation was as follows:

The appropriation for the present fiscal year is $4,300,000. I estimate that this should be increased $301,000 for the next fiscal year, which would make the appropriation $4,601,000.

The law authorizes the Postmaster-General to pay clerks of class 5 $1,400 per annum, and those of class 4 $1,200 per annum. These salaries were paid until July 1, 1876, at which time it was found the amount appropriated was insufficient to pay the number of clerks thus employed. It was then decided that the clerks receiving $1,400 should be reduced to $1,300, and those receiving $1,200 to $1,150.

I would respectfully recommend that an additional appropriation of $29,400 be made, so that the salaries of the clerks of class 4 may be increased to $1,200 per annum as provided by law; and that an additional appropriation of $51,900 be made, so that the salaries of the clerks of class 4 may be increased to $1,400 as provided by law.

It will be observed the total increase recommended for this purpose aggregated that sum of $81,300.

It will be noticed that this sum of $81,300 added to $4,601,000, the sum estimated for this branch of the service, produces the exact amount appropriated, namely, $4,682,300.

The Appropriations Committee in the Forty-eighth Congress heard the representatives of the postal service touching the recommendation of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, and urged an additional appropriation of $81,300, in accordance with the recommendation of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service. If we turn to the act of March 3, 1885, making appropriation for the postal service for the year ending June 30, 1886, we find appropriated for pay of railway postal clerks the exact sum of $4,682,300, which is the aggregate of the estimate for the service on the old basis, namely, $4,601,000 and the recommended increase of $81,300.

It seems to me there can be no question but $81,300 of this sum was appropriated for the special purpose of paying clerks of classes 4 and 5 the full amount of their salary allowed by law. It is demonstrated by the estimates and by the appropriation which followed, and in no other way can it be explained how this appropriation came to be for the exact sum of $4,682,300. Yet the clerks of classes 4 and 5 are being paid at the old rate of $1,150 per annum for clerks of class 4, and $1,300 for clerks of class 5. Why? The Postmaster-General declines to execute the law and apply the appropriation in obedience to the will of Congress. At page 419 of the report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1885 will be found the following:

The annual appropriation for the pay of railway post-office clerks for the current fiscal year is $4,682,300. Of this amount, $81,300 was presumably appropriated for the special purpose of increasing the salaries of clerks of the fourth and fifth classes to the rates of compensation paid prior to 1st of July, 1876; but, inasmuch as the appropriation bill, as approved, does not state specifically that such was the intention of Congress, the Postmaster-General is of the opinion that this fund can not be drawn upon for that purpose. With this amount deducted, the sum available for the pay of postal clerks for the present year is $4,601,000.

Mr. BLOUNT. What are you reading from?

Mr. BURROWS. From the report of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, page 419, from which it will be observed the superintendent states he has not used the $81,300 "presumably appropriated for the special purpose of increasing the salaries of clerks of the fourth and fifth classes to the rate of compensation paid prior to July 1, 1876," because the "Postmaster-General is of the opinion that this fund can not be drawn upon for that purpose." The Postmaster-General looks only to the letter of the law, and in the letter of the law he finds no mention of $81,300 for this specific purpose, and therefore he refuses to make use of the appropriation. "It is not so nominated in the bond." But if he had examined the estimates he would have discovered the items entering into the appropriation of $4,682,300, and would have observed that this amount was reached by including $81,300 to enable the Postmaster-General to pay clerks of classes 4 and 5 the salary allowed by law. But for some reason the purposes of the Postmaster-General are better served by looking only to the letter of the law, and so, declining to examine the estimates or obtain any information beyond what the statute conveys, he declines to execute it.

In another instance we shall find where the law was perfectly plain for the purpose of making that statute a nullity he found no difficulty in looking beyond the letter of the law and outside of it for a reason upon which to base a refusal to execute the will of Congress. But of that further on. If it shall be the will of the committee to increase this appropriation by the sum of $90,200, I suppose the appropriation must be so worded and separated that there will be no difficulty in determining the object to which the appropriation is to be applied. In framing the amendment I shall endeavor to make it so plain that a wayfaring man, though a postmaster-general, need not err therein.

The next item to which I desire to call attention is "for the transportation of the foreign mails." This bill appropriates $375,000 for this purpose. The estimate for this service is $350,000 and the bill carries $375,000 or $25,000 more than the estimates. But in making that estimate the Postmaster-General, or the Superintendent of the Foreign Mail Service, says:

If it should be decided to pay to vessels of United States register, for the transportation of mails to foreign countries, the whole amount of the postage collected on the mails conveyed (calculated at the Postal Union rates of postage, namely, 5 cents per one-half ounce, or $1.60 per pound of letters and post-cards, and 1 cent per two ounces, or 8 cents per pound, of other articles), the above estimate for "the transportation of mails," &c., would be increased, from $350,000 to $425,000, and the total from $425,000 to $525,000.

Again he says:

If it is the will of Congress that the entire sea and inland postage shall be given to vessels of United States register for the mails transported by them, the estimate of $350,000 must be increased $75,000, as you will observe by reference to the table herewith transmitted, which gives the weight of the mails conveyed by vessels of United States register for the fiscal year of 1885, and shows the total sea and inland postage thereon to be $81,679.67.

So, upon the recommendation of the Post-Office Department, it is stated that if it is the will of Congress to pay American vessels the whole amount of the sea and inland postage, it will be necessary to increase this appropriation of $350,000 to $425,000. The committee have added only $25,000 to this estimate, presumably to cover the sea and inland postage, but which is $50,000 short of the recommendation of the Post-Office Department. Of course we are all familiar with the law as it now stands touching the carriage of the foreign mails. By reason of the Postmaster-General's failure to execute the law passed by the last Congress we are thrown back upon an old statute, section 4009, which provides that for transporting the foreign mails the Postmaster-General "may allow as compensation, if by a United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage; and if by a foreign steamship or by a sailing vessel any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mail so transported." So that, as the law now stands, the maximum amount possible to be paid to American steamships is the sea and inland postage. If the Postmaster-General, in the exercise of his discretion, shall deem it advisable to pay the whole amount of the postage on a letter, 5 cents, from San Francisco to Hong-Kong, he is authorized under the law to do so, and he can not in any case exceed the amount of the postage on the mails conveyed.

I shall move to amend the bill at the proper time so as to make the appropriation for this service equal to the full amount of the sea and inland postage, and only regret that under the rules of the House I can do no more. But I am quite certain that this committee will at least place a sufficient amount at the disposal of the Postmaster-General to enable him to pay to the American lines the full amount of the sea and inland postage. I hold in my hand the last report of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails; and let me call the attention of the committee to the amounts paid American lines for carrying the foreign mails upon basis of sea postage only and the sum which would be awarded if they were paid the full amount of the sea and inland postage, and I will then submit whether, in the judgment of this committee, the full amount of the sea and inland postage should not be paid, and whether that sum is not wholly inadequate.

The Pacific mail line last year, sailing from San Francisco to Panama, made twenty-five trips and received for carrying the United States mails the beggarly sum of an average of $49.53 per trip. That was the sea postage, and if you had given the sea and inland postage that line would have received an average of $140.20 per trip. For carrying the mails from New York to Colon, thirty-eight trips, this line received an average of $199.45 per trip, and at sea and inland postage it would receive an average of $517.43 per trip.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company, from San Francisco to Yokohama and Hong-Kong, made in each round trip a distance of 12,180 miles, and for carrying the United States mails received for each round trip an average sum of $194.81. If this line had received the entire amount of the sea and inland postage its compensation would have averaged $562.54 per trip.

Take the New York, Havana and Mexican Mail Steamship Company from New York to Cuba, Mexico, &c. The distance sailed on each round trip was 2,348 miles, and it received for each trip an average sum of $82.68 for mail service. If the Postmaster-General had paid this line the full amount of the sea and inland postage it would have received an average sum per trip of $238.64.

The Red D line, the only line running to Venezuela touching the great countries of South America bordering on the Caribbean Sea, made in each round trip a distance of 6,132 miles, and received for transporting the United States mails an average of $56.55 per trip, while the sea and inland postage would have yielded an average of only $115.01.

Bear in mind, too, in this connection, that all these lines are called upon at their own expense to go to the post-office in San Francisco or New York and convey the mails to the steamer and land them at the port of their destination, defraying all the expenses attending such service.

The Occidental and Oriental Steamship Company, plying between

San Francisco and Japan and China, on each round trip made a distance of 12,180 miles, for which it was paid for carrying the United States mails an average of $137.11. If the United States had paid the full amount of the sea and inland postage, it would have given that line an average of only $394.77. Is that extravagant compensation?

The New York and Cuba Mail line, running between New York and Havana, made on each round trip a distance of 2,348 miles, for which it was paid for carrying the United States mails the magnificent sum of $38.01. The sea and inland postage would have amounted to only $113.23.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The gentleman asks a question. That might depend upon how much it carried.

Mr. BURROWS. Not at all. The United States and Brazil Mail Steamship Company, opening to us that great empire of the south, sails in each round trip 10,308 miles, and the Postmaster-General paid that line for carrying the United States mails the sea postage $323.86. The sea and inland postage would give to that line $445.53.

The Clyde line from New York to Hayti received for its round trip of 2,630 miles for carrying the United States mails $32.55. Had this line been paid the full amount of the sea and inland postage it would have received an average of $86.01 per trip.

So the American Steamship Company from Philadelphia to Queenstown, running on each round trip a distance of 6,524 miles, was paid for United States mail service the sum of $74.55 per trip. The sea and inland postage would have yielded an average compensation of $86.15.

It is needless to continue the recital. Sufficient appears to inform the committee how inadequately this service would be paid even at the full rate of sea and inland postage.

In contrast with the compensation possible to be allowed American lines for the transportation of the foreign mails, I desire to submit the following table which discloses the compensation paid the steamboats for our coastwise and inland service.

Compensation paid steamboats for coastwise and inland service.

Service.	Distance.	Number of trips per week.	Annual pay.
	Miles.
Eastport to Lubec	3	6	$400 00
Parkersburg, Va., to Pomeroy	87½	6	7,800 00

Jacksonville to Fort George	23½	6	1,599 00

Mr. DOCKERY. Have you made an average of the mileage?

Mr. BURROWS. I can not give that just here. Without extending this table, I may state generally that the inland and coastwise steamboat-service, which made a distance last year of 2,540,607 miles, was paid $563,002; while the foreign service by American lines, which made the distance of 2,052,686 miles, was paid only $46,387. If the entire amount of the sea and inland postage was paid the American lines for carrying the United States mails it would not exceed $130,000 per annum.

I submit, therefore, that nothing less than the full amount of the sea and inland postage should be appropriated, and I regret exceedingly that we are powerless to do no more. But under the law that is the limit of our authority.

Congress at its last session, appreciating the needs and the importance of this service, attempted to do something toward sustaining the American lines in carrying the United States foreign mails by enacting the following law:

For the transportation of foreign mails, including transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contract for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after a legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the mails so contracted shall be carried on American steamships, and that the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed one-half the sum hereby appropriated.

It is known to the country and conceded by all that this provision of the law remains unexecuted, and the will of Congress in this regard is entirely nullified. The law seems plain. There is nothing in it obscure or mysterious; but the Postmaster-General in this instance, in order to nullify the law, goes outside of its plain provisions to find reasons for making it a dead letter. Read the law and it seems easy of comprehension. What does it require? First, a contract with American steamships for carrying any portion of the foreign mails; second, after legal advertisement; third, to the lowest responsible bidder; fourth, at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile each way actually traveled; and, fifth, $400,000 is hereby appropriated to carry out contracts so made. Is there anything obscure in this statute? Certainly nothing. And yet no portion of this law has been executed. Nay, more, the Postmaster-General has never taken a step in the direction of its execution. Why? He says in his report, page 35:

A statement compiled in the Office of the Foreign Mails shows that the total miles sailed last year and to have been expected to be sailed this year by all American companies would be over 2,050,000, and the total compensation at the maximum rate would exceed $1,025,000, or over two and a half times the utmost authorized expenditure.

And because, upon such computation, the amount necessary to pay the full compensation of 50 cents a mile would exceed the amount appropriated, the Postmaster-General refuses to make any expenditure whatever. Now, it is quite true that if you take the whole number of miles sailed last year by the American lines, to wit, 2,050,000, and multiply it by 50 cents, the maximum price per nautical mile, the result will be $1,025,000, and will exceed the amount appropriated by $625,000. Therefore the Postmaster-General argues, "because upon this assumption a greater sum is required for this service than was appropriated, I will take no step whatever toward the execution of the law, but will treat it as a dead letter." Obviously it will be of the utmost importance hereafter that every committee having an appropriation in charge shall see to it that every item in the bill is sufficient to meet the needs of the service, otherwise the Postmaster-General will use no portion of it.

But in making this calculation, the Postmaster-General falls into a trifling error. In reaching the basis that the whole number of miles traveled by the American lines last year was 2,050,000, he doubles the distance from San Francisco to China and Japan, and from New York to Havana, taking the total distance made by the two lines running over each of these routes; when he knows that if those routes were let to the lowest bidder one line on each route would be excluded, and so the number of miles upon these two routes might be reduced from his calculation 385,000 miles.

In other words, he computes the distance and the expenditure for about 400,000 miles more than would have been traveled if he had executed the law. Suppose he had let the route from San Francisco to China and Japan and the route from New York to Havana to the lowest responsible bidders; and suppose the contract between China and Japan had been awarded to the Occidental and Oriental line and the service between New York and Havana had been let to the New York, Havana and Mexican line, then the distance sailed by those two lines in conveying the United States mails would be, upon the basis of last year, 263,560 miles instead of 649,508 miles, the basis of the Postmaster-General's computation. So, I repeat, in this computation he falls into an error of about 400,000 miles, and thus makes the amount required for the service upon his theory about $200,000 more than it actually would be. And yet if this administration comes within 400,000 miles of the truth perhaps we ought not to complain. [Laughter.]

But this assumption proceeds further upon the theory that, with or without competition, there would be no bid under 50 cents a mile, and that all lines would be employed at that rate. That is a baseless assumption. How did the Postmaster-General know that there would be no competition? He concedes that there were competing lines on the routes between San Francisco and China and Japan, and between New York and Havana, and yet he allows for no reduction of price resulting therefrom.

What right had the Postmaster-General to assume that, and upon what theory could he assume it? Competition always brings reduction of price. The rule is inexorable. So this assumption of the Postmaster-General falls. But he says further, as a reason for not executing this law, that there was competition upon only two lines, and no competition on any of the other lines; and therefore he asserts that to advertise for the lowest bidder on routes where there is no competition would be an idle ceremony. "What object would there be," says the Postmaster-General, "in advertising for the lowest bidder on a route where there is but one line?"

Does the Postmaster-General in advertising for bids for the star-route service ascertain in advance whether there is more than one stage running on each route, and if he finds a route on which there is but a single stage line does he decline to advertise for bids on that route?

But, again, what right had the Postmaster-General to assume that advertising for service on these ocean routes would not provoke competition? He might as well, as I have said, refuse to advertise for proposals to carry the mails on some distant star-route because there is no competing stage line as to decline to ask for bids for the ocean foreign service for the reason that at the time of advertising there is no established competing line. The principle is precisely the same.

But there is another fact which the Postmaster-General might have discovered if he had been looking for means to execute instead of nullifying this law. From March, 1885, to October, 1885, the very time when he was called upon to advertise for bids for carrying the foreign mails, there were eight first-class iron steamers tied to the wharves in New York out of business, seeking employment, and anxious to enter into any remunerative service. What right had the Postmaster-General to say that those idle sea-going steamers would not have been competitors for this service or for some portion of it? Again, how did he know but that vessels actually engaged in other service might not be withdrawn and become competitors for this? The Postmaster-General must have been possessed with more than mortal wisdom and foresight to have foreseen and forejudged all these things.

But again, the Postmaster-General knows, as every member of this House understands, that the argument that to advertise for bids upon routes where there was no competition would secure the service only at the maximum amount, and that that would have exceeded the appropriation, is completely answered by the fact that he had it within his power to reject all bids. The Postmaster-General never advertises for bids for carrying the mails upon star-routes or other lines that he does not reserve to himself the right to reject all bids. So, if he had advertised for this service and found that the amount of the bids exceeded the amount of the appropriation, it was within his power to reject them all or any portion of them.

Again, it was within his power to say in his advertisement that all bids above a certain amount would not be considered, and by so doing he could have restricted the amount to the limit of the appropriation and at the same time executed the law.

There was nothing under the sun to prevent him from doing this. More than this; the great American steamship lines united in a request to the Postmaster-General to execute the law, and stated that if he had any apprehension about the bids exceeding the amount of the appropriation they would undertake to say that the maximum amount bid should not exceed 20 cents per nautical mile, at which, if every line was employed now in this service, the total would not overreach the appropriation. Yet the Postmaster-General declined. It seems as if he was determined from the beginning that this law should not be executed; and it is a significant fact that he has never taken a single step toward its execution.

But observe in the next place that he declined to execute this law, because upon two lines there was competition. Upon all the lines but two, there being no competition, he declined to execute the law for that reason; yet in the next breath he says it is impossible to execute this law, because upon the San Francisco, China and Japan line and the New York and Cuban line there is competition. I can not execute the law in the first place because there is no competition; and in the second place I can not execute it because there is.

What reason does he assign for not executing the law upon the lines where there was competition? Because, he says, "if I had advertised for the lowest responsible bidder upon lines where there was competition the contract would have been awarded to the lowest bidder, and all others would have been excluded." Of course that is so; but Congress had so determined the matter, and the Postmaster-General had but to remember that the duties of his office, in the language of Mr. Cleveland, were purely executive.

It follows, therefore, if he could not execute the law upon two lines because there was competition, he could not have executed it upon any if there had been competition upon all. The reason would be the same. So the first argument, that he could not execute this law because there was no competition, falls to the ground, for he admits virtually that if there had been competition upon every line he would not have executed it, because that would diminish the service, and Congress did not in his opinion do a wise thing in enacting such a measure. I would like to inquire what the Postmaster-General had to do with that matter.

If Congress in its wisdom saw fit to provide for the foreign-mail service by letting it to the lowest responsible bidder, is he to be permitted to say to Congress "I will not execute your law, because in my judgment it is unwise?" After having given these reasons for failing to execute this law, he supplements his argument with an extensive tabulation showing that if these companies are paid the sea-postage for carrying the foreign mails they receive more per pound for the service than they get for carrying pork, salt, or other merchandise; and he says in substance, "because these lines would derive a greater revenue for carrying these mails, even at sea-postage, than they get per pound for transporting pork and hides, therefore the compensation is sufficient and I will not execute the law."

But suppose Congress should determine, as it did at its last session, to pay more for carrying the mails than for carrying hides. Is the Postmaster-General in that event to be heard to say, "I will not execute this law, because in my judgment it is paying too much." The question is too preposterous for debate. It seems to me that matter is no part of the business of the Postmaster-General; it is none of his concern. Congress determines the rate of compensation to be paid for this service; and when it determined to let this service to the lowest responsible bidder at a rate not exceeding 50 cents per nautical mile, it was the business of the Postmaster-General to at least make an effort to execute that law, instead of refusing to take any steps towards its execution, and then offering to Congress so trifling an apology.

How true it is sometimes that man—

Mr. Chairman, when this portion of the bill is reached in Committee of the Whole I shall move to increase the appropriation for this service from $375,000 to $425,000, the sum which the Postmaster-General says is necessary to pay the full amount of the sea and inland postage; and I mistake the temper and patriotism of this House if it does not do for this service all that the law will permit, and regret that it can do no more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I will yield the gentleman ten minutes of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] desires to yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Michigan, if he will accept it.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Michigan makes a satisfactory arrangement with me, by which I have agreed to yield twenty minutes of my time to him.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I was about to say that the administration of the Post-Office Department is subjected to just criticism not only in regard to the matters to which I have referred but in other particulars of no little public concern. It has not only nullified the law touching the administration of the postal service, both domestic and foreign, but with uncommon effrontery it has defied not only the spirit but the very letter of the civil-service law.

Reaching, as the Post-Office Department does, into every city, town, and hamlet in the broad land, there was no Department of the public service where this administration could have given more convincing proof of its sincerity in the matter of reform in the public service than in the Post-Office Department. And yet there has been no branch of the public service where that law has been more wantonly and persistently violated. From the beginning to this hour the head of that Department has sought, as in other instances, not how he might execute and enforce this law but, on the contrary, how he might with impunity violate it.

In saying this I do not wish to be understood as intimating that there has been an honest observance of the civil-service law in other Departments. On the contrary, it may be affirmed, I think, that in all the Departments, from the highest to the lowest, there has been a persistent effort to nullify it. If this be true, the Democratic party, after all its professions, deserves and will receive public condemnation.

If there has been any one thing in the last fifteen years to which the Democratic party seemed more ardently attached than any other it was reform in the civil service. In season and out of season, in public and in private, by speech and platform, it has coveted every occasion to make solemn protestation of its devotion to this new-found object of its idolatry. [Laughter.] Its enthusiasm at times would brook no restraint.

Although reform and the Democratic party never had any personal acquaintance until 1872, when they met for the first time in a Liberal Republican convention, yet from that hour there sprang up an attachment between them which has been absolutely phenomenal. Some slight conception of the warmth of its devotion at that time may be gathered from the following declaration preserved in its platform of 1872:

> The civil service of the Government has become a mere instrument of partisan tyranny and personal ambition, and an object of selfish greed. It is a scandal and reproach upon free institutions, and breeds a demoralization dangerous to the perpetuity of republican government. We therefore regard a thorough reform of the civil service as one of the most pressing necessities of the hour; that honesty, capacity, and fidelity constitute the only valid claims to public employment; that the offices of the Government cease to be a matter of arbitrary favoritism and patronage, and that public station shall become again a post of honor.—Democratic platform, July 1872, Baltimore.

In 1876 the Democratic party renewed its vows of fidelity with such earnestness as to banish all thought of the possibility of betrayal, in the following language:

> Reform is necessary in the civil service. Experience proves that efficient, economical conduct of the governmental business is not possible if its civil service be subject to change at every election, be a prize fought for at the ballot-box, be a brief reward for party zeal, instead of posts of honor assigned for proved competency, and held for fidelity in the public employ; that the dispensing of patronage should neither be a tax upon the time of all our public men, nor the instrument of their ambition.—Democratic platform, Saint Louis, Mo., June 27, 1876.

In 1880 its ardor had somewhat cooled, and was fast settling down into respectful consideration, as the following declaration in its platform discloses: "We pledge ourselves to a general and thorough reform of the civil service."

In 1884 six words, compressed into one curt sentence, measured its waning regard: "We favor honest civil-service reform."

But if the public mind had become somewhat distrustful of the sincerity of the Democratic party in its professions touching reform in the civil service, it was fully reassured by Mr. Cleveland in his letter of acceptance, in which he said: "The selection and retention of subordinates in Government employment shall depend upon their ascertained fitness and the value of their work. Public employment will be open to all who can demonstrate their fitness to enter it." These are some of the professions with which the Democratic party came up to the campaign of 1884 and under which it was intrusted with national control.

In view of these utterances the people had a right to expect, and in many instances were undoubtedly deluded into the belief, that the Democratic party would in good faith redeem its promises in this regard.

That, in the language of the Democratic platform, "honesty, capacity, and fidelity" would be the only valid claims to public employment, and that, in the words of the President, "the selection and retention of subordinates in Government employment would depend upon their ascertained fitness." Indeed the Democratic party and its nominee for the Presidency were so completely committed to the doctrine of reform in the civil service that there was no escape from the execution of the law in this regard but by public renunciation or secret evasion. The former step would have been commendable in the highest degree in contrast with that other course which this administration seems determined to pursue. To have failed to execute the law would have been bad faith; to pretend to execute it while secretly nullifying it is not only bad faith but hypocrisy.

The first intimation of a plan by which the consequences of Democratic professions might be avoided came from Mr. Cleveland in December, 1884, after the service of the people at the ballot-box was no longer required, and nothing remained to complete his title to the Presidency save the formal declaration of the result of the election. Then it was that the President-elect in a letter to Mr. Curtis pointed out the way by which the Democratic party might escape from all its pledges to the people and fill the public offices with the adherents of the Democratic party in utter disregard of the letter and spirit of the civil-service law. I quote from that letter the following:

There is a class of Government positions which are not within the letter of civil-service statute, but which are so disconnected with the policy of an administration that removal therefrom of present incumbents, in my opinion, should not be made during the terms for which they were appointed, solely on partisan grounds, and for the purpose of putting in their places those who are in political accord with the appointing power. But many now holding positions have forfeited all just claim to retention, because they have used their places for party purposes in disregard to their duty to the people, and because, instead of being decent public servants, they have proved themselves offensive partisans and unscrupulous manipulators of local party management.

The term "offensive partisan" makes its appearance in this letter for the first time since the election and opened a broad avenue for escape from Democratic pledges. In hoc signo vinces. [Laughter.]

The Postmaster-General was not slow to seize upon the suggestion of the President-elect, and before he had been in his office sixty days he issued one of the most remarkable letters ever emanating from the head of any Department under any administration. This communication is marked "confidential" and signed officially by William F. Vilas, Postmaster-General. This document is so unusual, to say the least, that I beg leave to quote it in full:

[Confidential.]

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, April 29, 1885.

DEAR SIR: The continued illness of Mr. Hay will delay his coming for some time yet to the Department, and I think it desirable that some action should be taken in the way of removals, and am impatient to assist our people in securing relief to which they are justly entitled from partisan postmasters. I have had a conference with the Virginia delegation and they will soon bring in their cases, and I shall hope to make the earliest removals in that State. As soon as they shall be ready, and I hope within a week, I desire to appoint from three to ten in a county in Virginia, amounting to several hundred altogether. I had intended to invite yourself and the Democratic delegation from Ohio to meet me this week and consider the plan upon which we should proceed in making removals in Ohio. But I understand it will be inconvenient for some to travel hither now, and it has occurred to me that perhaps the same end might be accomplished by writing. I shall beg you, therefore, to consider the suggestions I make as to the methods of procedure, and if you can adopt them and get some cases ready within the next two or three weeks I think within the month of May I can give substantial relief that will take away the importunity and discontent. I think that from 15 to 25 per cent. of the fourth-class postmasters in Ohio might be removed within the next two months, and great good accomplished thereby, if our people will adhere to a proposed plan.

This is, in short, to pick out the most obnoxious and offensive partisans in each county, to the number of a sixth to a quarter of all, and choose first-class men to take their places. I will require no more proof of partisanship in these selections than the affirmation of knowledge on the part of a Representative or Senator that the postmaster has been an active editor or proprietor of a Republican newspaper, printing offensive articles, easily shown by slips; or a stump speaker, or member of a political committee, or officer of a campaign club, or organizer of political meetings, or that his office has been made the headquarters of political work, or that his clerks have been put into the performance of political duties. Possibly other acts of equal force may be noted in some cases. If the Representative does not know the fact, it should be established by some affidavit of some person whom he can affirm to be of unquestioned credibility, or by some documentary evidence.

In recommending for appointment, I beg the Representative will state the age, business, and what kind of business experience, and a description of the business character of the applicant, and also of his habits and standing in the community. It would be well to file evidence showing that he will be satisfactory to the community, and when there are various candidates I shall be obliged by any explanation which the Representative can give.

This necessarily imposes a little trouble, and yet not very great, but it seems to me reasonable to require very extraordinary care and trouble enough to be taken to represent surely the facts. The earliest removals and appointments of this kind will challenge the keenest scrutiny. The former must be justifiable and the latter beyond criticism. Some mistakes have perhaps occurred, and our adversaries are keenly interested to make the most of every fault, because they have perceived a strong current of general approbation of the purposes of the administration.

In rendering this justice to our people, which consists of the removal of and substitution of our friends, I feel that it is very desirable to proceed with extreme care, and that I am correctly representing the President's wishes and purposes in earnestly soliciting that every step may be taken accordingly. I may add that as the common good is infinitely beyond the welfare of any one person, however great his place, so appointments, to further a mere personal end, should be absolutely forbidden, and recommendations upon that basis may well expect disfavor.

I shall very willingly take up the case of any district or of any county whenever they are ready, and I shall be glad if the Representative can personally attend and go over them. Papers should be sent in as soon as possible, and will be then carefully briefed in the Department, and when so made ready appointments can be made with great rapidity.

Should you think it desirable to have a personal conference before this is begun I shall be very glad to meet the delegation.

But as I have felt it desirable to relieve them of unnecessary journeying and expense, I have written a similar letter to each Representative from Ohio and respectfully solicited responsive action in accordance with the spirit of it.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM F. VILAS, Postmaster-General.

The foregoing communication was addressed to the Democratic members of Congress from the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Virginia, and no comment can make its impropriety more apparent.

On the 4th day of March, 1885, the President-elect in his inaugural address declared that "the people demanded the application of business principles to public affairs," and that "civil-service reform should be in good faith enforced." While these high-sounding words were ringing in the public ear the Postmaster-General is writing a "confidential" letter to Democratic Congressmen "to get their cases ready," and he thought "from 15 to 25 per cent. of fourth-class postmasters in Ohio might be removed within the next two months." This is the "application of business principles to public affairs." [Laughter.] While the echo of these words was yet ringing in the public ear the Postmaster-General quietly whistles to his side the whole uncounted pack of hungry office-seekers and sets them upon the track of honest officials with instructions to hunt them down and hold them at bay until the Postmaster-General could take their official life. This, Mr. Chairman, is reform in the civil service! This is "doing business behind glass doors." [Laughter.] The whole history of American politics discloses no parallel to this.

It is no part of my purpose, Mr. Chairman, to catalogue the long list of removals or count the disreputable appointments which make up the first year's record of this reform administration. Every Congressional district has its instances, and these are within the knowledge of the individual members of this House. I only desire to summarize the result of the application of "business principles to public affairs," as exemplified in the Post-Office Department during the first twelve months of its administration.

The First Assistant Postmaster-General, in his able annual report for the year ending June 30, 1885, at page 27, states the whole number of Presidential offices at that date was 2,233, and the whole number of fourth-class post-offices 49,019. To these 2,233 Presidential offices there were appointed, between March 4, 1885, and March 4, 1886, 1,078 Democratic postmasters, or nearly one-half of the entire number were changed the first year. Of those 1,078 appointments, 782 were made necessary by reason of death, resignation, or expiration of commission; 288 were appointed to succeed postmasters suspended, 7 in place of postmasters removed for cause, and 1 to succeed a postmaster removed—nearly 300 suspensions and removals in twelve months in Presidential offices alone. Not content with 782 vacancies caused by death, resignation, and expiration of commissions, the President supplements this record by 296 suspensions and removals—upon what ground the country is not yet advised.

But this does not furnish a fair illustration of the workings of reform in this Department of the Government. The President and undoubtedly the Postmaster-General have felt themselves somewhat hampered and embarrassed by that provision of the Constitution which makes it necessary in these matters to take the advice and obtain the consent of the United States Senate. Such a requirement gives undue publicity to official conduct and destroys that freedom of action which is found in fourth-class offices, where the will of the Postmaster-General is supreme.

In response to the request of the Senate recently directed to the Postmaster-General calling upon him to state the number of removals in fourth-class offices between March 4, 1885, and March 4, 1886, he states the whole number of removals between those dates to have been 8,635. This does not include appointments to vacancies, but all these were removals ostensibly for cause. Add to this the Presidential removals during the year and we find the total removals of postmasters to be 8,931 in twelve months. That is over 744 a month, 28 every working day, 4 an hour or 1 every fifteen minutes. This is conducting the affairs of the Post-Office Department on "business principles."

The foregoing exhibit, in a single branch of the Post-Office Department, furnishes a fair illustration of the practical workings of the civil-service law as interpreted by the Postmaster-General. What is true of this Department is undoubtedly true of all. Indeed, as early as June, 1885, the country was advised by Mr. Higgins, when hungry Democrats were complaining of the delay in furnishing them with the means of subsistence, that there had already been between three and four thousand changes. "There are," he said, "about eighty-five internal revenue collectors, and fifty-two of them are now Democrats. Each has under him fifty to one hundred employés, and all these are being constantly changed. So you will perceive that you can soon count up to the thousands. It is the same with the customs officers and the post-offices." This declaration was made within ninety days after this administration came into power. This is upon authority of Mr. Higgins, and what he does not know about "reform" is scarcely worth acquiring.

But the most ludicrous feature in this whole reform business is the constant boasting of the Democratic party that it has brought the Government back to the practices of the fathers, and that in the application of its reform views to governmental affairs it is reproducing the halcyon days of Jeffersonian simplicity and Jacksonian honesty. One is at a loss to know which most to admire in this assumption, its novelty or its audacity.

Let us read a page of the nation's history in the days of the fathers touching the question of removals in the civil service. Washington in eight years removed only nine, all for cause. John Adams in four years removed nine, and, he stated, none for political reasons. Jefferson in eight years removed thirty-nine; none for party purposes. Madison in eight years removed five. Monroe in eight years removed nine. John Quincy Adams in four years removed two. The first six Presidents holding the Presidential office for forty years removed only seventy-three office-holders. Seventy-three removals in forty years! Why, sir, the Post-Office Department alone has made more removals than that in forty minutes [laughter], decapitates more than that before breakfast as a mere appetizer. And yet the Democratic party has the impudence to look the American people in the face and declare without even blushing that it has returned to the practices of the fathers.

Mr. LONG. What has been the nature of the appointments made in place of those removed?

Mr. BURROWS. I have said that that was within the knowledge of the individual membership of this House, and I repeat that I have no time to explore that field. Let us have done with this farce of reform. The people are sickening of it. It was quite an attraction in the beginning, but it has ceased to draw, and you had better ring down the curtain and put out the lights if you would save the performance or the performers from public ridicule and contempt. Take it from the boards, or it will be hissed off by a disgusted public.

And here let me say that the crowning infamy in this whole business of reform lies in the dishonorable methods employed to secure the removal of honest, capable officials. If you would say to a Republican, "I want this office because you are a Republican, and I want it for a Democrat because he is a Democrat," that would be honorable and manly.

But you say, "We can not do that, for we are committed to the doctrine that removals shall not be made for partisan reasons, and that honesty, capacity, and fidelity shall constitute the only valid claims to public enjoyment. We must seem to keep this promise to the public if we blacken the good name of every Republican official in the land." And so you permit, nay, not only permit, but invite, charges to be made against faithful and upright public servants upon which they are removed, and thereupon you give out that they are removed or suspended for cause. But when the suspended official or his friends ask to be advised of the nature of these charges, then this reform administration replies, "That is a sealed volume, and you can not be permitted to open it."

I am not alluding now to the controversy going on in the other end of the Capitol. I have in mind an instance within my own knowledge. Two Government officials in my own city, of unquestioned integrity and unimpeachable character in public and private life, were removed from office, and when I demanded of the head of the Department to be advised of the nature of the charges preferred against them, I was informed that I could neither have a copy of the charges nor be informed of their substance. These charges against those men are only harmless because no imputation can possibly destroy public confidence in their official or private character.

In this refusal to disclose the nature of these changes lies the infamy of this whole business. Men of the highest character in public and private life, against whose fair names the breath of suspicion even has never come, are turned out of office and branded with some crime which they are not permitted to know, and can not, therefore, disprove; and these charges, however false and infamous, unknown and unanswered, unanswered because unknown, pass into the permanent archives of this nation to remain so long as the Government shall stand. This, I repeat, is the crowning infamy of this whole business, and ought and will consign any party that approves it to deserved retirement.

But I am suspicious the Democratic party has deluded itself into the belief that such a course will lead to great party advantage and contribute to its future success. You argue that this method is a threefold victory; first, you say, we get the Republican official out and a Democrat in, which is of prime consequence; second, by withholding all knowledge of the grounds upon which removals are made we will keep from the people the real cause, which is purely a political one, and continue the deception that we are reformers; and, third, by denying to removed officials the right to know and answer the charges made against them the suspicion will obtain that they are removed for some malfeasance in office, and in the approaching campaign we have but to point to the long list of removals for convincing proof of official corruption.

If this is your reasoning, let me say to you that you are making a fearful mistake. If you would remove the Republican official, saying to him, "It is not because you have not been a faithful and honest public servant, but solely because you are not in accord with the Democratic party," there is not a Republican official in the land who would not gracefully surrender and accept the situation. He would probably continue a Republican from conviction, but the simple loss of his office would not spur him to unusual zeal. But when you remove him upon some secret charge, emanating from some secret, unknown source, which he is not permitted to know or answer, reflecting upon his public or private character, he not only continues to be a Republican, but he becomes your active, implacable foe. The office was of little value to him, but his good name is a priceless legacy, cherished above all else, which he hoped to bequeath untarnished to his children. That is but a common sentiment.

> Who steals my purse steals trash; * * *
> But he, that filches from me my good name,
> Robs me of that which not enriches him,
> And makes me poor indeed.

You, for party ends, are wantonly placing a stain upon thousands of good names, and be assured they will not rest inactive under the foul aspersion. Nay, more, their kinsmen and their friends will make common warfare with them. Honorable men of all parties will espouse their cause, and this Democratic reform administration will answer for its vilification of worthy citizens at the bar of public opinion, where it will receive swift and merited condemnation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and had come to no resolution thereon.

DUTIES OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, and 9, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 13 of said bill, after the word "of," strike out the word "the" and insert the words "every such;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert in lieu of the matter stricken out the words "from time to time;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. RANDOLPH TUCKER,
JOHN H. ROGERS,
JOHN W. STEWART,
Managers on the part of the House.
JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
W. B. ALLISON,
J. R. McPHERSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement which, under the rules, accompanies the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The conferees of the House upon House bill 5544 present a statement of the effect of the amendments of the Senate to the bill as it passed the House and as finally agreed upon by the committee of conference of the two Houses.

The amendments 1 and 2 give the appointment of the acting assistant treasurer to the Secretary of the Treasury, as head of Department, while the original bill gave it to the Treasurer.

The original bill gave power to appoint such officer for an unlimited period. The amendment of Senate numbered 3 limits it to thirty days.

Senate amendments 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8 require the Treasurer to give a new bond in terms covering "the acts and defaults of the person so appointed from time to time," before any such appointment shall be made under this act.

The Senate amendment numbered 9 makes the title to the bill more specific, in adding to the title of House bill the words "authorizing the temporary appointment," &c.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. R. TUCKER.
J. H. ROGERS.
J. W. STEWART.

MARCH 24, 1886.

The conference report was agreed to.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending that motion the Chair will present certain personal requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent Mr. ROCKWELL was granted indefinite leave of absence, on account of the serious illness of his mother.

By unanimous consent Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, was granted leave of absence, for three weeks, on account of important business.

The motion to adjourn was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 3998) for the relief of Susan A. Wamack, administratrix of the estate of Stephen M. Farish, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 4493) to amend the act of June 15, 1844, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in respose to a resolution of the 23d instant, the information that the amount of Government bonds called for payment May 1, 1886, owned by national banks, is $5,440,350; which, on motion of Mr. INGALLS, was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Patrick Collins, a private in Company C, Seventh Infantry, praying for the removal from his record of the charge of desertion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of 60 citizens and ex-soldiers of the United States, praying that their pay during the war be made equal to gold at that time; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Knights of Labor of Hamilton, Ohio, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of Sallie Ann Bradley, widow of Thomas J. Bradley, late a private in Company D, Eighteenth Ohio Volunteers, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of Mrs. R. J. Nelson and sundry other ladies, and gentlemen as well, of Ryegate, in the State of Vermont, praying for the passage of a joint resolution submitting a constitutional amendment to the several States so as to provide for woman suffrage. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present an additional paper, in the form of an affidavit, in regard to the pension claim of Mrs. Sarah J. Foy, now before the Committee on Pensions. I move that the paper be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the petition of Matthew S. Lillie, late a private in Company K, Eleventh Regiment Vermont Volunteers, praying to be allowed arrears of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of E. H. Kime, late private in Company B, Battalion P. H. B. Maryland Cavalry and Company B, Twenty-first P. V. Cavalry, praying that the charge of desertion may be removed from his military record; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DOLPH presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., remonstrating against any reduction in the duty on coal and lumber; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oreg., in favor of the forfeiture of the Northern Pacific Railroad land grant for that portion of its main line between Wallula and Portland; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition of many reputable citizens of the District of Columbia, objecting to the erection of certain structures on the square bounded by First and Second and B and C streets, northwest, alleged to be dangerous to the surrounding property. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of T. F. Wilson and Flora E. Henley, clerks of the Timbered Hills monthly meeting of Friends, in the State of Kansas, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 355, for the creation of a board of international arbitration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of the Knights of Labor of New Orleans, La., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of ex-soldiers of Jasper, Ohio, praying for the passage of a law embodying the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PIKE presented resolutions adopted by Harmony Grange of Patrons of Husbandry of New Hampshire, remonstrating against increasing the postage on fourth-class mail matter; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1250) authorizing the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, to construct a bridge across Young's Bay and Skipanon Creek, in the State of Oregon, reported adversely thereon, and moved its indefinite postponement; which was agreed to; and he reported a bill (S. 1971) authorizing the county of Clatsop, in the State of Oregon, to construct a bridge across Young's Bay and a bridge or permanent roadway across Skipanon Creek, in the State of Oregon; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. FRYE. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 184) for the encouragement of the American merchant marine and to promote postal and commercial relations with foreign countries, to report it with amendments.

The bill appropriates about eleven hundred thousand dollars for carrying the mails of the United States in American vessels to and from foreign countries. It makes it the duty of the Postmaster-General to advertise proposals, to accept the lowest bids, and to enter into contracts for the carrying of these mails. The bill received the unanimous indorsement of all the members of the Committee on Commerce who were present at the meeting.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ALDRICH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 182) for the relief of Thomas S. Hopkins, late of Company C, Sixteenth Maine Volunteers; and

A bill (S. 483) to restore Sidney B. Tullar to the pension-roll.

COMMISSION ON GOVERNMENT MANUSCRIPTS.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Library to report back the bill (S. 1851) establishing a commission to report to Congress on manuscripts belonging to the Government, and to recommend its passage. The bill is very short, and I think will be passed without any objection. I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator to listen to me for one moment. The bill does not provide for spending any money or give any authority to anybody whatever. It simply provides that the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and the Librarian of Congress shall be a commission to report to Congress the character and value of the historical manuscripts belonging to the Government and some scheme for editing them or making them public.

We have now many such manuscripts of great value. We have, for instance, the original records of the Virginia Company, or rather a copy made the first year or two after the settlement in Virginia; we have the Franklin papers, the Rochambeau papers, and others; and scholars all over the country are beginning to apply to the Librarian or to the Secretary of State or to the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution for leave to take those papers and edit and print them as private speculations. If an incompetent person does that work, it drives a competent person out of the field hereafter; that is, if you get a poor and badly annotated edition nobody will then want to make a good one.

The bill simply authorizes the three officers named to report to Congress the character and value of the historical manuscripts in their possession, and to suggest what scheme shall be pursued by Congress for giving them to the public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of State, the Librarian of Congress, and the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, and their successors in office, are hereby constituted a commission, whose duty it shall be to report to Congress the character and value of the historical and other manuscripts belonging to the Government of the United States, and what method and policy should be pursued in regard to editing and publishing the same, or any of them.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1972) to facilitate the administration of the laws in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SAWYER introduced a bill (S. 1973) granting a pension to Everhard Welter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1974) providing for the erection of a public building at the city of Hastings, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1975) for the relief of Mrs. Sarah H. Wood, of Baltimore, Md.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1976) to provide for the survey of certain historic grounds, locations, and military works; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1977) granting a pension to George B. Cock; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 1978) to extend the benefits of the act approved March 3, 1885, to certain pensioners whose disabilities are caused by amputation of the right arm; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MCPHERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1979) for the erection of a statue and monument to John Barry, the first commodore of the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SABIN (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1980) for the relief of William Webster, of Maine; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1981) to amend the act giving the approval and sanction of Congress to the route and termini of the Anacostia and Potomac River Railroad, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1982) for the relief of Charles Murphy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 57) in regard to the pay of retired officers of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, it was Ordered, That Charles Murphy have leave to withdraw the papers in his case from the files of the Senate.

REMOVAL OF FOURTH-CLASS POSTMASTERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster-General, transmitting, in reply to a resolution of the 4th instant, a statement of the number of fourth-class postmasters removed since the 4th of March, 1885; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask that the tabulated list of removals of fourth-class postmasters accompanying the communication of the Postmaster-General be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

The list is as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1886.

SIR: I have before acknowledged receipt of a certified copy of the following resolution, adopted by the Senate on the 4th of March instant, namely:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate how many fourth-class postmasters have been removed in each State and Territory since March 4, 1885."

In response thereto I have the honor to submit inclosed tabular statement of the number of fourth-class postmasters who have been removed in each State and Territory respectively from March 4, 1885, to the date of the resolution.

Very respectfully,

WM. F. VILAS, Postmaster-General.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore of the United States Senate.

MARGARET B. HARWOOD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 284) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood, which has been returned from the House of Representatives on the request of the Senate.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill granting a pension to Mrs. Harwood. It is the House bill, I understand, that has been laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the House bill instead of the Senate bill.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the House bill be taken up for consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the House bill be read for information, and let us know why we should take it up and act upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows.

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret B. Harwood, widow of Rear-Admiral Andrew A. Harwood, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. BLAIR. I will explain to the Senator from Missouri——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question of taking up the bill is not debatable. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I will hear the Senator's explanation. We ought to know what it is before we are called upon to agree to take up the bill.

Mr. BLAIR. By unanimous consent I will state that this is one of the ordinary bills for increasing the pensions of widows of rear-admirals and officers of high rank from $30 to $50 a month. A bill was introduced in the Senate and a like bill in the other House. The Senate passed its bill and sent it to the House. It was received there at substantially the same time that the House was acting upon its bill, which was in precisely the same terms. The House passed its bill and sent it to the Senate. Thus each House had passed the same bill and each was in possession of the bill passed by the other.

When the Senate received the bill coming from the other House I moved to take up the House bill and proceed to its consideration and put it on its passage, but it was suggested that the Senate bill was in possession of the House and something might be done with that bill there. Whereupon the House bill was laid upon the table and an order was adopted requesting the House to return the Senate bill, which has been done, so that the Senate bill is now in possession of the Senate.

I move to take up the House bill in order that it may be passed, and if it should be passed I shall then move the indefinite postponement of the Senate bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I remember now that the bill was here before; and while I am opposed to the principle of all such bills, I shall offer no objection to this one being considered.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the votes by which the Senate passed and ordered to a third reading Senate bill 284, upon the same subject, will be reconsidered, and the bill will be indefinitely postponed. That order is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department; and

A bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

DAVID W. JONES.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 1557) for the relief of David W. Jones. The beneficiary is an ex-soldier and the relief granted by the bill is the restoration of a lost check. It is a short bill, and I presume there will be no objection to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It instructs the pension agent at Washington, D. C., to issue duplicate check numbered 63632, for $1,549.33, in favor of David W. Jones, for one lost in the mail on the 31st of August, 1880.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI WATER-POWER AND BOOM COMPANY.

Mr. SABIN. I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the bill is to take any time in discussion I shall be obliged to ask my friend not to press it, because it was rather the understanding yesterday that in order to finish the matter before the Senate as unfinished business the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] should be allowed to go on to-day before the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. SABIN. The bill has been thoroughly considered by the committee, and if it provokes any discussion I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Minnesota to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in line 7, after the word "Brainerd," to insert "to be approved by the Secretary of War;" so as to read:

That the consent of the Government is hereby given to the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company of Brainerd, Minn., to construct across the Mississippi River, at some point not more than 2 miles from the limits of said city of Brainerd, to be approved by the Secretary of War, a dam, canal, and the appurtenances thereof, for water-power and other purposes, and in connection therewith a wagon and foot bridge for public travel.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 16, to strike out the word "detriment" and insert "destruction;" so as to make the proviso read:

That the Government of the United States may at any time take possession of said dam and control the same for purposes of navigation, by paying said company the actual cost of the same, but shall not do so to the destruction of the.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, to add as an additional section:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Minnesota about the location of this dam in reference to the dams that are now already constructed at the head of the headwaters of the Mississippi?

Mr. SABIN. It is 200 miles above navigation, above the Saint Anthony Falls.

Mr. DAWES. How far is this from the Leach Lake Indian reservation?

Mr. SABIN. It is several hundred miles below.

Mr. DAWES. There is no possibility of its flooding that reservation?

Mr. SABIN. Not at all. It is a hundred miles out of the way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to suggest in regard to the alteration and repeal clause, that it has been sometimes contended, I think without any authority of law, where Congress repeals a private grant of this kind and thereby destroys the value of the property which could only be used under the authority of the grant, a claim arose in favor of the persons who had expended their money against the United States for that thing. I do not want to leave this bill open to any such doubt. The company must take this authority subject to the chance that Congress may find the dam so injurious to public interests as to repeal the act altogether without having to pay them anything, which I am sure they would not now think of claiming.

I, therefore, move to amend that clause by adding:

Without any claim of any kind arising in favor of any party in consequence of such amendment or repeal.

That is the law now, I think, but it has been sometimes claimed, once on the Ohio River where a very large claim was made, and I think it was decided adversely by the Supreme Court of the United States; but to guard against any possible misapprehension I think those words should be inserted.

Mr. SABIN. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of section 2 insert:

Without any claim of any kind arising in favor of any party in consequence of such amendment or repeal.

So as to read:

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved, without any claim of any kind arising in favor of any party in consequence of such amendment or repeal.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SABIN. I ask for the appointment of a committee of conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate insist on its amendments and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes. If there be no objection that motion will be regarded as agreed to.

By unanimous consent the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. DOLPH, SABIN, and RANSOM were appointed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill concerning the Army, which was agreed should be the unfinished business for this morning, be laid aside, retaining its place in the next morning that we have, in order that we may proceed to consider the resolutions reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. I do this in pursuance of what was partly the understanding yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no special order made of the Army bill for to-day. There had been for the previous day.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will ask that, because otherwise the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] would have a right to move to take it up. So I ask unanimous consent that the Army bill keep its place as unfinished business and be put in a position to be the unfinished business of the morning hour at the next sitting.

Mr. COCKRELL. Just let it keep its place, the place it has now at the head of the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be before the Senate at any rate. The Senator from Illinois would have a right to move, we should all yield to him to move, to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection Senate bill No. 777, known as the Army bill, will be considered as the unfinished business of the morning hour to-morrow. The Chair hears no objection, and that order is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolutions; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 73) authorizing the printing of committee reports; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 89) providing for the distribution of the Official Register of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 831) for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (S. R. 39) authorizing the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting the statue of the late James A. Garfield; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

AMENDMENT TO A BILL.

Mr. CAMDEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 4731) for the allowance of certain claims reported by the accounting officers of the United States Treasury Department was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 5543) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The following bill and joint resolutions were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Printing:

A bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 73) authorizing the printing of committee reports; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 89) providing for the distribution of the Official Register of the United States.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, which will be announced.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We all understand what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send copies of certain papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. VOORHEES. Mr. President, I address the Senate to-day with great reluctance. The subject under consideration has not been an attractive one to my mind from the beginning, and now that an able and exhaustive debate has apparently left nothing for even the hand of a gleaner, I approach the field not with pleasure, but only from a high and imperative sense of duty to those in whose behalf I stand here; and if I can but here and there gather something of value and bring it as my contribution to the cause of constitutional government, I will be fully content for the great body of the work to have fallen to the care of others on this side of the Chamber.

Sir, the exact issue as presented by the resolutions now before the Senate is the proposed condemnation of the Attorney-General of the United States for an alleged violation of his official duty, and for conduct "subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof." It would be difficult indeed to conceive a graver accusation against a public officer. The reason for this hurtful charge against the Attorney-General consists in the fact that he has acted in obedience to the direction of the President of the United States in the discharge of important executive business.

The resolution, it is true, contains an insinuation against the President, but not a direct and open assault upon him. It alleges that the Attorney-General deserves condemnation, "under whatever influence he may have acted," in refusing the call of the Senate for certain papers, while the committee well knew that the influence thus vaguely mentioned was explicitly stated by the Attorney-General himself in his letter of January 28 to be the positive direction of the President.

Why did the Judiciary Committee halt at the Attorney-General's office? Why did it choose to strike the agent and shrink from designating the principal as the real object of attack? The letter signed by the Attorney-General of January 28 was written, as he says, by the direction of his chief, the President. Did the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS], did any member of the committee of which he is chairman, expect a Cabinet officer to disobey the Executive and retain his place for a single hour? I can understand very readily that the head of a Department, differing in his opinions of constitutional duty from the President, would refuse to comply with his directions and resign; but agreeing, as the present Attorney-General does with the Executive, was he expected to do other than he has done?

The pending resolutions are not joint in their character, and contemplate no measure of legislation to remedy any evil, or supposed evil. They are simply a fulmination of Senatorial opinion; they are barren of result to the Attorney-General, other than a cheap partisan denunciation. It is true that in addition to his condemnation and the declaration that he has violated his official duty, and is at war with the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration, there is a threat that if the papers sought continue to be withheld the nominations now or hereafter made by the President for appointments to office shall not be confirmed by the Senate.

Is this a proposed punishment of the Attorney-General, or of the President who directs him in these proceedings? A more illogical and rediculous sequence to a given state of facts can not be conceived.

The second resolution of the series under discussion appears to be the indictment, and the third, to which I have just alluded, contains the farcical penalty. In point of fact, however, what are the relations, under the Constitution, between the Senate of the United States on the one hand and the Attorney-General and the President on the other? If the Attorney-General is guilty of a violation of his official duty and of a subversion of the fundamental principles of the Government, he is liable to a far different proceeding and punishment. The measure now before us is trivial, puerile, inconsequential, and barren of importance compared to that called for by the Constitution against a public official willfully recreant and disobedient to law.

I know no other proceeding provided by the Constitution in such a case than impeachment. If the allegations in these resolutions are true, the Constitution as framed by the founders of the Government makes ample provision for the trial and condemnation of the faithless delinquent. No one is too high to escape the power of the organic law. But we are here engaged in condemning a public officer who has had no articles of accusation presented against him according to the Constitution, who has had no opportunity to face his accusers, who is permitted to call no witnesses in his behalf, who can not be heard in person or by counsel, who has no trial, nor even the semblance of a trial.

We begin where trials according to law end. Our first work is to condemn and declare the penalty, a penalty which will carry neither injury nor disgrace save to those who inflict it. It is true the Senate possesses certain judicial power, and of a very high character, and it has been resorted to a few times in American history. Who, however, will pretend that it can be invoked against a public officer except by the House of Representatives presenting articles of impeachment?

The Constitution provides that all civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice-President, shall be removed from office upon impeachment and conviction of various high crimes and misdemeanors, and that the House of Representatives "shall have the sole power of impeachment;" that the Senate "shall have the sole power to try all impeachments;" that "when sitting for that purpose they shall be on oath or affirmation;" that "when the President of the United States is tried, the Chief-Justice shall preside;" that "no person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present;" and that "judgment shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit, under the United States."

If the Attorney-General has willfully and knowingly—as he must have done, if he has done so at all—violated the sworn duties of his office, and is engaged in subverting and overthrowing and involving in ruin the very foundations of the Republic, then he has indeed committed one of the highest crimes known to the Constitution and the laws and for which an impeachment would be loudly and imperatively demanded. On the other hand, however, these resolutions propose nothing and can accomplish nothing, save possibly the exclusion from office of a few worthy men and women.

They have been proposed here for popular effect, and for that alone. They are relevant to no duty which this Senate has to perform, nor in which it has any share or responsibility. Nor is there anything more certain than their failure to meet approval in the public mind, for "fair play is the first feeling of the masses, and fair and impartial trial is the law of the heart as well as of the land, and no condemnation is tolerated of any man by his enemies. All such are required to retire from the box and the bench on a real trial; much more, to refrain from a simulated one, and above all from instigating one."

But, again, why is not this blow aimed directly, in terms and by name, at the President of the United States? The whole world knows that it is his policy which is complained of. The country will take notice of this evasion, and I may say, this want of candid courage. Perhaps an instinctive perception on the part of the majority of the Judiciary Committee as to the real aspects of its issue with the President may have induced them to obscure it somewhat by interposing the Attorney-General as the object of assault.

For months past the public ear has been vexed on the subject of an alleged conflict between the Senate and the Executive. Sir, this is a Government of great and diversified interests as well as powers. This is a country of mighty resources, extensive populations, and of absorbing and commanding pursuits, all calling for the wisdom, vigilance, and prudence of patriotic statesmanship. The business of the country has an imperiled outlook. Labor is overtaxed and scantly paid by reason of long-standing vicious legislation; human suffering is wringing its hands and weeping in many parts of the country in destitution for want of proper employment and remunerative wages.

The great questions of the tariff, of taxation, of finances—all bearing upon the great industries—appeal to us at every moment for wise and safe legislation. Great corporations are overshadowing the land, and absorbing or defying the powers of State and nation and grinding the flesh and blood of men and women into their huge and massive profits. American commerce no longer has a bottom on which to float on the high seas. These and other vast concerns confront us in the chambers of legislation with their constant and legitimate demands upon our time and attention. But in the midst of them all what a poor, contemptible thing is this which comes into our counsels, obstructs and disturbs the business of the country, and harasses the patience of well-meaning people!

The Senator from Vermont halts the column moving on in support of the general welfare, and demands, with an incoherent threat, that he shall be permitted to ransack and examine the correspondence of the President of the United States. He claims the right to pry open the drawers of the Executive, in order to ascertain what has been written to him concerning a few people who have been disturbed in their enjoyment of official patronage. He claims the right to scrutinize every communication on this subject which has reached the President. He demands every letter, from high or low, vile or pure, cultivated or ignorant, black or white, male or female, sane or insane.

The inclination of my mind is toward great publicity in affairs of the Government, and until I gathered the full scope and purpose of the Senator from Vermont from a reading of his report and from listening to his speech, I was not so fully convinced as I am now of the monstrous pretensions embraced in his claim. Well might he state, as he did on this floor, that it had been at least forty years since any occasion of this kind had arisen between the executive department of the Government and the Senate. He might with absolute accuracy and truth have further stated that never in a single instance, from the foundation of the Government, had such an occasion arisen.

As was conclusively and ably shown by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], there is no precedent whatever for it in American history. The powers of this great body were never before invoked for such an ignoble purpose. The Senator from Vermont produced here and cited perhaps more than a hundred instances wherein the Senate had called upon the Executive in the past for information on every conceivable question of public interest. I have examined all his citations, all the precedents which he claims for his present course. In but one single instance, and that of very easy explanation, has there been a call since the adoption of the Constitution by the Senate or any one of its committees for papers or information in possession of the executive department touching the question of removals from office.

The Senator from Vermont flourished in our faces the request of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate of April 7, 1879, for papers on the subject of the removal of the chief-justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Utah and the appointment of his successor. It was signed by Allen G. Thurman, chairman. The Senator left those who were not better informed to suppose he had correctly quoted Judge Thurman against the position now maintained by the President.

It is well known however, and must have been at the time, by the Senator himself that the question of inquiry addressed by Judge Thurman to the Attorney-General was in relation to the exception made in section 1768 of the Revised Statutes as to the power of the President to remove judges of the courts of the United States. They are set apart as an excepted class in that section, and it was a grave question, and is now under consideration by the present Judiciary Committee, whether the President, under his general power of removal from office, can remove Territorial Federal judges.

I have a right to say that this was the object of the inquiry of the Judiciary Committee through Judge Thurman in April, 1879, because his views upon the power of the President to remove without let or hinderance from the Senate, and without assigning reasons for his conduct, are to be found most plainly stated in the debates of this body in 1869. He is there recorded to have said that the power of removal from office is an executive power; that the assent of the Senate is not a necessary and logical result; that the Senate consents to appointments, and that, in his opinion, it is wiser that it should be as our fathers settled it; that the offices would be better filled and the laws more faithfully executed if this power is vested in the President alone, and for these reasons he announced his vote for an unqualified repeal of the tenure-of-office act.

What comfort, then, does the Senator from Vermont get from the position of the great Senator from Ohio? The Senator from Vermont indulged in high eulogy upon Judge Thurman; he announced, to the delight of all who heard him, that Judge Thurman was the greatest Democrat in the United States, and then proceeded to say that he was the best, the noblest, and the bravest, because he had the courage to denounce Democratic frauds on the ballot. If that be, and I concede it is, a claim to great distinction, it is one in which, so far as I know, the Senator from Vermont has no share, no denunciation of Republican fraud at the ballot or anywhere else ever having been heard from him.

There is another aspect, however, to this issue as raised by the Senate against the President in which it becomes nugatory, void, and even ridiculous. Not a Senator on this floor has dared to allege the right of the Senate to demand of the President his reasons for making suspensions or removals from office; indeed, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has expressly denied any such right. From the days of the great debate in 1789 on the organization of the Departments of the Government until the evil days of 1867, the right of the President to remove from office upon his sole responsibility was never questioned. The Constitution does not use express words conveying this right, but those who framed it and who took part in the first legislation under it gave it that interpretation. Even in the angry and memorable contest between the Senate and General Jackson, when Clay and Calhoun for the time being forgot their own animosities in their common hatred of the old hero, they were careful not to deny or question his right of making removals from office, merely alleging, when he removed the Secretary of the Treasury for his conduct as to the deposits of the United States Bank, that it was an abuse, but not a usurpation, of power.

I might detain the Senate at great length in citing the opinions of the past upon this subject, but will not. That work has already been done in this discussion. I can find no ground where opinions contended over this question until the baleful passions and conflicts of 1867 engendered and brought forth as their pernicious offspring the tenure-of-office act. A general law, enacted on account of a particular person and for a particular exigency, is rarely if ever fraught with continuing good results. The act in question was aimed by an angry, heated, and disappointed party in power at what was conceived to be the treachery of one of its most conspicuous leaders. But for the failure of the Republican party to control Andrew Johnson the tenure-of-office act would never have been known, and the old, unbroken current of authority on the subject of removals from office would have remained undisturbed.

Oliver P. Morton, then a Senator, said in his place on this floor, speaking of the tenure-of-office law:

> My understanding is that it was adopted for a special purpose; that it was special in its character; that it was intended to meet a condition of things that had never occurred before in the administration of this Government, and which we hope will never occur again. It was not made for all future Presidents, but it was made to meet the condition of things arising from what was regarded as the maladministration of President Johnson.
> Sir, let me ask this question: If the tenure-of-office law had not been passed when it was, and was not now the law of the land, would it enter into the head of any Senator, of any member of Congress, now for the first time to pass such a law? No, sir; that would not occur to any one. * * * I believe that the repeal of this law is demanded by the best interests of the country. In other words, I do not believe that the administration can be carried on efficiently and successfully under the operation of the law.
> Now, in regard to executive officers, the President is charged with the execution of the law. He can not do that in person; he must do it through the various agents and officers of the Government; but if those agents and officers are not subject to his removal when they become delinquent, or are found to be inefficient, or are guilty of malfeasance in office, I ask how he can efficiently administer the laws? The very efficiency of his administration depends upon the efficiency and fidelity of his agents; and if they are inefficient, or if they are not faithful, who will understand so well as he, because he holds all the sources of executive information?
> Then, sir, upon every consideration I urge the repeal of this law. * * * Why continue it? Is there anything in the history of the Government that demands its continuance? Nothing. For seventy-eight years, until 1867, the Government was administered without such a law; and although such a law may have been suggested upon several occasions, yet that suggestion never made any impression on the public mind.

It is true, as was so well shown by the able and eloquent Senator from West Virginia, that the Senator from Vermont tried to give this law a respectable birth and a decent motive for coming into the world in 1867.

He said it was enacted for no partisan purpose and for no special occasion, but for all administrations and for all time. When General Grant became President, however, some two years later, what a change came over the Senator from Vermont. The measure enacted for all administrations and for all time seemed at once to have served its purpose, and was only fit to be hung up, powerless and incapable for good or for evil. And in fact it was so hung up as long as Republican administrations remained in power. From March, 1869, to March, 1885, who ever heard the tenure-of-office law invoked in this body? While Grant and Hayes and Garfield and Arthur were in the Executive Mansion this mischievous law was as torpid as a venomous reptile in the dead of winter, but the moment the people placed a Democrat in the same mansion it was warmed into life and action by partisan heat, and is now made to obstruct and wound the public interests.

Sir, it is very plain to my mind, and must be to every student of this subject, that in so far as the tenure-of-office act touched upon, restrained, infringed, or curtailed the power of the President to make removals at pleasure it was a palpable violation of the Constitution. This is true, or else James Madison, the father of the Constitution more than any one else, and all the ablest thinkers from his day to the present, have been in error as to the true interpretation of that instrument. A constitutional right can not be taken away or impaired by legislation; but even granting to the tenure-of-office act its constitutionality, which I do not, and all the force claimed for it by its friends, as modified in 1869, it is not pretended that under it the reasons operating on the mind of the Executive in making removals or suspensions from office can be successfully demanded.

If that be true, and I know no assertion to the contrary on the other side of the Chamber, what use has the Senate for the papers of the President, whether official or otherwise? Why stop and make distinctions between public and private papers? Why split hairs about what papers are official or unofficial, when, even if they were surrendered to us, we would be exactly where we are now, without the slightest right or power under the Constitution to question the President's action in the premises? It has been thought, doubtless, by the Senator from Ver-Vermont and others that it would be a popular cry before the country to demand the production, inspection, and publication of communications to the President. The people, however, are more capable of correct discernment than is commonly supposed in certain quarters. They can and will very easily and very quickly perceive that the production of these papers over which we are wrangling with the President will be of no utility whatever, conduce nothing to the public good, and aid the Senate in no respect in the discharge its proper duties.

They will see in the course pursued by the majority of the Senate an eager, unwarranted, partisan desire to fasten a quarrel upon a new administration and to obstruct its constitutional, orderly, and successful conduct of the Government. They will see in this issue precipitated upon the President an unseemly and heretofore an unknown effort on the part of a party long in power to retain its adherents in office in defiance of the popular will. It may be said, and doubtless has been, that the President could easily solve the difficulty by surrendering his correspondence; but he is not warranted by his oath of office in submitting to an invasion in the slightest particular of his constitutional rights as the Executive of the Government. He holds the office, not for himself alone, nor for his term, whether it ends soon or late; he holds it for the American people, in trust, to be transmitted without impairment in any of its great functions to those who come after him.

The American people will not be deceived or misled on this point. The little clamor of the passing present will directly be hushed in the presence of the acknowledged fact that the Constitution, which the President has sworn to support, compels him, whether willingly or reluctantly, to pursue the course he has taken on this point. But may I not ask in this connection whether the Republican party, its leaders great and small and its masses, have any right to complain of proscription or injustice at the hands of the present Executive? The changes have been rung in this body on the fact that there are six hundred and forty-three nominations here pending and seeking confirmation. Six hundred and forty-three nominations! It is variously estimated that there are from one hundred thousand to one hundred and twenty thousand office-holders in the United States whose tenure of office is either directly or indirectly subject to the will of the President.

For twenty-four years this tremendous patronage was in the hands continuously of one of the strongest, most zealous, vehement, and proscriptive political parties ever known in the history of the world. From 1861 to 1885 the issues before the public, the thoughts in the minds of men, the purposes which moved and inspired action, the very objects in view made partisanship fierce and unrelenting. Of this I make no complaint. It was in the nature of man and in the nature of things that it should be so. I make the allusion only to account for the fact that if during that long period a Democrat or any one differing materially from the policy of the dominant party held official station it was either an oversight or an arrangement not creditable. The great official army in the civil service of the country was Republican in politics in all its branches and to the very core.

A long lease of power has in all periods of the world begotten false notions and encouraged dangerous pretensions. It is hard now, in many cases impossible, for those so long in possession of official favor to realize that others have any claims to supplant them. They have been taught to believe not only that they are a favored class, but that their services are absolutely necessary to the well-being of the Government. Their leaders, on the hustings and in the press, have prophesied for years that a change of administration into the hands of the Democratic party would involve the country in dishonor, disorder, and a universal retrogression in all its mighty interests. Even in behalf of the very few, therefore, the mere handful, who have been displaced, the President is assaulted, lamentation is heard everywhere, the public business is obstructed, and the public service threatened with confusion by the rejection of competent and honest men whose names have been sent here for confirmation. Six hundred and forty-three!

Sir, I indorse the President most fully and emphatically on the subject of removals or suspensions as far as he has gone, and how gladly would I indorse him could he see his way clear to go a thousand leagues further. It seems to me the country will laugh with derision in the face of the majority of this Senate in its attempt to condemn the President for his exercise of the power of removal. Democrats might complain, were they not conscious of the grave embarrassments surrounding the present administration when it came into power. We might point to these Departments and to the Federal offices all over the land and declare that far too much forbearance had been shown to those who never extended any to their adversaries. In round numbers there are three thousand six hundred people in official station in the Interior Department alone. There have been less than four hundred changes, including the able and faithful Secretary himself and the principal positions next to him.

With the exception of forty or fifty such changes at the heads of bureaus and divisions, nearly all the appointments in that Department under the present administration have been in the Land and Indian service on the frontier and for messengers, watchmen, and the like. The great body of the force, more than thirty-two hundred in number, embracing nearly all the pay-roll of any value, is still a solid Republican political corps, sympathizing with the success of their own party and desiring and laboring for the overthrow of the party under which they hold office. Substantially the same state of facts exists in every other Department of the Government. It is safe and moderate to say that, with the exception perhaps of fourth-class postmasters, there are ten Republican office-holders in the United States this hour for every one Democrat in the public service. I have no hesitation in declaring, as far as my voice will reach, that such a state of things is not consistent with the true theory of a popular government, nor with its safe and honest administration.

And here I again quote from the greatest political leader the Republican party ever followed in Indiana. In March, 1869, Senator Morton held the following language in this body:

> I believe that it is proper that the Executive of this nation should have his subordinate officers in harmony with himself in political opinion. Not only his Cabinet, but those below the Cabinet in responsible positions, other things being equal, should be men who agree with him in his general line of policy.

> Now, sir, whatever pretenses we may make here on this subject, practically they will be hypocritical. Why? Because this party, nor the Democratic party, nor any other party that may come can practice or allow the administration of the Government upon these principles. Those in authority will place in power as their subordinates their friends and those who agree with them in political principle and those who have been instrumental in placing them in power. Whatever professions we may make here, that will be the result.

Such were the utterances of a man of great ability, powerful common sense, a deep insight into human nature, and a wide experience in public affairs. They are as true now as they were seventeen years ago, and they will remain true as long as popular governments remain upon the earth; as long as the laboring masses are permitted to aspire to honors as well as to bear burdens.

Sir, from the earliest dawn of history the main effort of the great body of the people of every race and country has been to overcome caste, class superiority, exclusive privileges, and to establish for themselves an equality in all respects in the ventures, advancements, and promotions of life. This theory was at last established by the founders of the American Republic. This Government, in the literal sense, belongs to the people, and there is no position of honor or profit from which the humblest and least favored by birth or fortune can be excluded. The doors of caste, privilege, or favoritism can be closed against no one.

The mechanic goes from his work-bench to the Executive Mansion, and he who in his youth held the plow and turned the sod becomes a Senator or takes the head of a Department. Every place is open to honorable ambition and virtuous industry. It is the right of the citizen and creditable to him to aspire to the confidence of his countrymen, whether as township trustee, county commissioner, neighborhood postmaster, Department clerk, consul abroad, or in any other official station, from the lowest to the highest. Any movement in curtailment of this great popular right is, in my judgment, a violation of the spirit of our institutions and an offense against good government.

The interest of the people in the affairs of their Government is the only remedy for corrupt practices and maladministration, and this interest will diminish and grow cold if they are barred from all participation in its control. I am not speaking of the spoils of office now, but of the equality and dignity of American citizenship.

The people also have the right to demand a change in the administration of their Government, and such change is not properly confined to a few of the chief offices. Each neighborhood, each township, each county, and each State has within it Federal officials who in the discharge of their duties may have given more cause of offense to the voter and a greater desire on his part for a change than the President himself.

This is not a government for life tenures in office. "Trained bands of office-holders" will not be tolerated here as they are by the custom and laws of England and other monarchies. The so-called civil-service-reform enactment did not commend itself to my judgment when it passed this body a little more than two years ago, and very recently I voted in committee, and shall repeat the vote here, for its absolute repeal. After a full and fair trial it has proven a violent and odious obstruction to the will of the people, a source of confusion and injury to the public service, and a constant stumbling-block in the way of a rational and successful administration.

The experience of this Government, and indeed of all governments, has amply and overwhelmingly demonstrated that no political party ever did or ever will administer successfully, harmoniously, and for the public good the affairs of a nation through the instrumentality of its enemies. The laws of human nature would seem to forbid the attempt of such an absurdity. What employer of labor, what commander of an army would willingly rely on subordinates filled with hostility, wishing him defeat and failure, censorious in mind, unfaithful in heart, and often only waiting an opportunity to betray him to his ruin?

At this very hour I have reason to believe there is not a confidential communication or transaction in any one of the Departments which has not been betrayed to the leaders of the Republican party. The very papers demanded in this controversy are familiar to eager Republican eyes, and their contents, whatever they may be, are better known on the other side of the Chamber than on this. There is not a record or a file in this Government closed to Republican search and inspection; there is not a room, hall, corridor, inner chamber, or closet which is not under the daily and hourly espionage of the enemies of the present administration. Chief clerks and chiefs of divisions and even private secretaries, confidential short-hand writers, and those who open letters for heads of Departments and bureaus are well known as malignant opponents of the Democratic party and inflamed with desire for the confusion and overthrow of the President and his constitutional advisers.

If I am answered from the other side of the Chamber at this point that political parties should have no secrets in their conduct of public affairs, I ask in return why, then, oftener than the changes of the moon, do you bury yourselves in caucus, withdrawing from the sight and hearing of the world, placing an inside and an outside sentinel at your door, with orders to exclude all such as are unable to give the password, the grip, and the sign, and to prevent even the approach of all eavesdroppers? Why have measures of the greatest moment to the American people been almost uniformly thus considered and matured by the Republican party, before they were brought up and ratified in Congress by the force of party discipline?

If again it is asserted that the departments of the Government should have no secrets from each other, and that every matter of confidence should be disclosed on demand, I reply by pointing to the records of the Senate itself, which from its organization by the fathers until the present hour has been a secret body in the transaction of a large portion of its official duties, tolerating no interference, inquiry, call for papers, or demand for reasons from any quarter whatever.

The President of the United States is fiercely arraigned here in this Chamber for exercising a constitutional prerogative, while his accusers engage almost daily in the exercise of the same prerogative in the same place where their denunciations are heard. The principal difference between the President and the Senate in the exercise of this prerogative is that the former has been too sparing, and the latter too frequent and exacting.

Sir, this assault upon the President, on a false record against the Attorney-General, is not because papers of no value to the Senate and of no consequence to the public have been withheld, but because Republican partisans have been suspended from office. The offense of the President in the minds of his accusers is not that he has refused information, already stale in their hands, but that he has here and there driven an overfed and pampered official from the public crib. This is the real point involved, and it can no longer be obscured. The taunt of enemies and sometimes the reproach of friends have been borne perhaps too long in silence by the supporters of the present administration. A few plain words may not be out of place here, and will at least be understood by those who have so long, in storm as well as in sunshine, given me their unwavering confidence.

The present administration, sir, came into power under circumstances without any parallel in American history. For a quarter of a century, lacking but one year, the Republican party had held the executive and judicial departments of the Government; for sixteen years of the same period it had controlled both branches of Congress, and for twenty-two years it wielded all the powers of the Senate. Every enactment on the statute-books during that long and momentous era of war, convulsion, reconstruction, and restoration was of party origin, approval, interpretation, and enforcement.

The great body of the laws was imbued with party spirit, and had been devised, construed, and executed for party success, and continued party domination. All the great and leading measures of the Government were aimed to strengthen and perpetuate party ascendency quite as much, if not more, than to promote the peace of the country and the prosperity, equality, and happiness of the people.

Every system of taxation, whether by tariff or by excise; every scheme of finance, whether in the establishment of the national bank, the violation of the contract for the payment of the bonds by the act of 1869 and other perfidious legislation of like character, the demonetization and destruction of silver as an honored branch of our currency and the perpetual warfare on the existence and integrity of the greenback; every gigantic corporation endowed with stupendous subsidies and enormous land grants, and which now stands astride this csntinent like some mighty Colossus, in whose shhadow and between whose legs, as it were, the people creep about in pursuit of the natural rights of man; all these and vast numbers of kindred and far-reaching measures had for their germ and the inspiration of their growth the aggrandizement and the perpetuity of the party then in power.

The whole field of Government power and concern was filled with partisan machinery, which remains to this hour. The Democratic party has not had the opportunity to enact a single law or to announce its policy in legislation since 1861. The present Executive, therefore, Democratic and elected by Democrats, was compelled to take charge of the Government and administer its widespread and tremendous interests under a system of laws organized in hostility to the Democratic party and for the purpose of preventing its return to power. This is especially true in regard to partisan legislation designed and accomplished for the purpose of obstructing removals from office.

The tenure-of-office act had that one single object in view, as has been fully shown, and all that remains of it now on the statute-book is an unconstitutional interference with the right of the Executive to enforce the laws through agents of his own selection. But at a still more recent period there came another enactment, fraught with still greater injustice to those who believe as I do, that the policy of change in every branch of the civil service is wholesome and beneficial, necessary to the purification of official life, and essential to the preservation of our purely popular form of government.

There is no other system of reform which can restore an incompetent or a dishonest official service to vigor and integrity. "Civil-service reform" is an attractive title to a law, but it is as misleading and deceptive in the present instance as the sugar-coating which hides from view and taste some pernicious and baneful drug. All right-minded people desire to reform and strengthen and purify the civil service of their Government, but there is a wide disagreement as to remedies.

I am willing to trust and abide by the remedy prescribed by our fathers in the Constitution, and never found wanting nor departed from until these latter days. Under the present law, enforced as it is with a long, entangling, and often incomprehensible code of rules, and with examinations conducted, in the main, by Republican officials, the active working forces of the Republican party have continued in office, as well protected as a military command in a fortification.

Sir, in the face of these palpable and admitted facts neither the President nor any of the heads of the Departments can be justly censured for moving slowly in the great work before them. In such a field rapid movements are not only unsafe, but impossible. But every act of the President has been in the right direction, and the country will understand why greater progress has not been made and will place the responsibility where it belongs.

But suppose we take a higher and wider range of view than the narrow issue presented by the resolutions under discussion. We have listened for many days to denunciations of the President and his policy, and men of years and distinction have prognosticated great evils to the country at his hands. We are reminded that one year of his administration has passed into history, and we are challenged to behold the results. Well, I accept that challenge and will take a brief look. I confess I can find no fulfillment of the dismal predictions of evil which was to follow the election of a Democratic President and the organization of a Democratic Cabinet.

It was loudly claimed that we would be disgraced abroad by such an event; that the nations of the earth had no respect for the Democratic party, and would only be civil and polite to us while a more pretentious and aristocratic organization controlled the Government. Looking to the State Department, however, under the present accomplished Secretary, and then sweeping the horizon of the world, you will find no cloud in the sky, no blemish on American honor, and no breach of national friendships.

On another subject, however, the leaders and the press of the Republican party in 1884 and since were, and have continued to be, very certain and positive of ruin and disaster to the country in the event of a Democratic administration. Such an intolerable calamity, it was vehemently asserted, would shake the financial credit of the Government to its very foundations; that investments in national securities would become insecure, and the precious bonds would not be paid; that all our various currencies, hard and soft alike, would tumble down into a sort of quagmire of depreciation; that the rebel debt—that myth with which to frighten fools—would undoubtedly be paid; that rebel claims for property lost during the war, and claims for slaves among the rest, would swarm over the ramparts of the Constitution and the laws and invade and sack the Treasury; that all these and many other schemes of dishonor would take possession of the Government and destroy its financial standing at home and abroad.

will some one point out any of these things or any sign of them? I do not see them nor any symptom of any such calamities. On the contrary, the credit of the Government stands like a tower of strengh; our currencies are jogging along together harmoniously and on an equality in purchasing power; the Secretary and the President both believe in silver as money, and the differences on that subject can be easily adjusted; no raids have been made for plunder on the Treasury, and the country feels secure in the ability and integrity of its present management.

And still other prophecies were indulged in which have been and are every day being answered to the satisfaction of all except those who made them. The disabled survivors of the war for the Union and the widows of the dead were publicly and privately, in season and out of season, and in every State and every county in the Union, earnestly assured that their pensions would be endangered and eventually lost by the success of the Democratic party. It was even claimed at times and in certain quarters that the pension-roll would be transferred from the North to the South, and that the confederate soldier would be pensioned instead of those who wore the blue. I think it will be admitted that this has not yet happened, that the "confederate brigadier" at both ends of this Capitol continues with annual certainty to vote nearly a hundred millions to the Union soldiers, their widows, and their children, and that better pensions are now paid than ever before.

And while taking this brief survey of results at the end of the first year why should we overlook the colored citizen? With what an infernal din of falsehood he was told that a Democratic administration meant his return to slavery; not only were all his rights of protection and equality under the laws to be swept away, but if Cleveland was elected President he and his whole race were to be hurled back into the old house of bondage. Old abolition speeches made twenty-five years ago were hunted up, retouched a little as to dates and circumstances and delivered over again, in order to horrify the negro with fiery and awful descriptions of the condition to which the Democratic party, if once in power, would consign him and his wife and his children.

In several well-authenicated instances, which were noticed at the time, colored people fell dead from fright on learning the result of the election in November, 1884. The Republican party ought to be indicted, arraigned, prosecuted, and convicted of brutal and inhuman cruelty to the colored people in frightening their souls out of the bodies by stupendous and grotesque political lying. To their wide-open and staring eyes the Democratic party was painted and caricatured as the most monstrous of all the beasts contained in Revelations. It was to darken the sun of freedom, blot out the stars of legal liberty, roll back the tide of human progress, and plant barbarism in the blooming gardens of civilization.

There was but one crushing charge from which the party of Jefferson and Jackson was spared, and even that has been hurled at it in this debate. The learned Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] with unsparing severity indulged in the mortal accusation that the Democratic party was a protoplasm! Sir, I think it well that this dreadful charge was not added to the terrors of the situation in the great campaign of 1884. Had it been known, and especially to the colored people, that in addition to all its other vices, crimes, and enormities, the Democratic party was, in the descriptive definition of Webster's Dictionary, "a viscid, nitrogenous material in vegetable cells, by which the process of nutrition, secretion, and growth goes forward," my imagination shrinks from contemplating what might have happened.

I feel constrained to tender my thanks to the accomplished scientist from Iowa for his forbearance in not calling public attention to the protoplastic and protoplasmic qualities of the Democratic party while the Presidential election was yet in doubt, for had it been understood that our party was simply a "noncellular formation" of a "vital vegetable substance" I have not the least doubt Cleveland would have been counted out in New York.

I also look back with dread upon what might have been the effect on the country if the scientific Senator from Iowa had taken it into his head to denounce the Democratic party as a parallelogram, a rectangle, or the hypothenuse of a right-angled triangle. We were mercifully spared, however, and slavery has not been re-established, the colored man is still free and equal before the law, and is now and then appointed to a very good office.

Sir, the one year of the present administration on which we are commenting has exploded the manifold calumnies which have assailed the Democratic party, and has shown to the American people and to the whole world that the party so long exiled and traduced can be safely trusted with the full control of the Government. False prophets have been put to open shame, railing accusers are without followers, and there is a sense of confidence in the general conduct of affairs equal to the best periods of the Republic.

The elections in November last showed no dread of a Democratic administration and no reaction against Democratic principles. On the contrary, there was a blaze of clean, straight Democratic victories all along the Atlantic coast, and extending from Boston to the lakes and the prairies of the great Northwest, notwithstanding the opposition of treacherous allies. Even the Senator from Iowa was the unwilling witness of a protoplastic political evolution in his own splendid Commonwealth, whereby the customary Republican majority of 40,000 was evolved into a floating diminutive atom of about 5,000. May that kind of evolution continue in the same wholesome direction until the survival of the fittest is fully established!

And now, Mr. President, as to the immediate result of the issue before the Senate, and as to its present and future effect on political parties, there need be no concern or alarm on this side of the Chamber and no exultation on the other. You may pass these resolutions, you doubtless will; but they will not be welcomed by popular acclaim, bonfires will not be lit nor cannon fired to celebrate the barren victory. The history of conflicts between the Senate and the Executive is not favorable to this body nor encouraging to its pretensions. It matters not how great the alleged grievance or how powerful the talent and the influences brought to bear, the Senate has never scored a victory in a collision with the Executive.

Even the ferocious and combined assault of both Houses of Congress on Andrew Johnson eighteen years ago brought no triumph for Senatorial opinion or Senatorial ambition. The contest at that time was thought to be most unequal, and that the odds were overwhelming against the President. He had no political party at his back on which to rely. He had belonged to both the great political parties of the country and had offended both beyond hope of forgiveness. He was a lonely man, and in his isolation he was more or less distrusted by all then engaged in public life, and in turn he distrusted every one who came near him.

No man in history at the head of a government ever had a weaker hold upon the confidence and affection of his countrymen than Andrew Johnson appeared to have when the abortive attempt was made to hurl him from power and dash him to pieces by impeachment. The question then, as it is now, was the right of the President to make removals from office, and the official sought to be removed was the most powerful leader of his party then living. There were eleven articles of impeachment presented, but the only high crime or high misdemeanor alleged against the President, however variously it may have been stated in the pleadings, was correctly defined at the time of the trial as follows:

> In article 1 the issuing of the order of February 21, 1868, addressed to Stanton, for the removal of Stanton from office, with intent to violate the tenure-of-office act and the Constitution of the United States and to remove Stanton.

But it was at last borne in on the public mind that Andrew Johnson was simply making a stubborn and determined stand in defense of the just powers of the executive office, as measured by the Constitution and as administered from the time of its adoption.

And, sir, in the great task of a correct settlement of the law, both constitutional and statutory, and in rebuking legislative invasion of executive authority no one, in my opinion, did so much or accomplished his work so well as the able and brilliant Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], who appeared as counsel for the accused President and soon afterward became his Attorney-General. The Senator from New York at that time placed the tenure-of-office act where it belongs—outside of the Constitution. He spoke of the act of the President in disregarding that act as "a violation of a law, if it shall be so held, in support of and in obedience to the higher obligation of the Constitution." Then he continued to say:

> Whenever anybody puts himself in that position nobody can make a crime of it in the moral judgment, or in the judicial determination. In sentence and measure of punishment, at least, if not in formal decision and judgment, no man can make a crime of it. We are treated to the most extraordinary view on the subject of violating what is called an unconstitutional law. Why nobody ever violates an unconstitutional law, because there never is any such obstacle to a man's action, freedom, duty, right, as an unconstitutional law.
> The question is whether he violates law, not whether he violates a written paper published in a statute-book, but whether he violates law; and the first lessons under a written constitution are and must be that a law unconstitutional is no law at all. The learned manager, Mr. Boutwell, speaks of a law being, possibly he says, capable of being annulled by the judgment of the Supreme Court. Why? The Supreme Court never annuls a law. There is not any difference in the binding force of the law after the Supreme Court has annulled it, as he calls it, from what there was before. The Supreme Court has no political function; it has no authority of will or power to annul a law. It has the faculty of judgment to discern what the law is, and what it always has been, and so to declare it.

I will not pause to inquire how it comes that the Senator from New York, entertaining the foregoing views, and declaring that Andrew Johnson violated no law, but simply obeyed the Constitution in disregarding the tenure-of-office act in the removal of Edwin M. Stanton, has permitted his honored and distinguished name to be affixed to the report and the resolutions condemning the present Executive. I cite the Senator's words with deference and respect and for the sole reason that in my judgment they constitute as complete an answer to legislative or Senatorial interference with the power of removal from office by the Executive now as they did when they were spoken.

But there is one other instance of conflict between the Senate of the United States and executive authority which crowds itself into my thoughts at this time. Fifty-three years ago, perhaps the most powerful combination of talent and commanding resources ever known in American history was formed to crush Andrew Jackson with the weight of a Senatorial condemnation. Benton, in recording the immortal struggle, says:

> Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun, and Mr. Webster were now all united against General

Jackson, with all their friends and the Bank of the United States. * * * Their movements all took a personal and vindictive, instead of a legislative and remedial nature. Mr. Taney's reasons for removing the deposits were declared to be unsatisfactory and insufficient—being words of reproach and no remedy; nor was the remedy of restoration proposed until driven into it.

The resolution in relation to General Jackson was still more objectionable. The Senate had nothing to do with him personally, yet a resolve was proposed against him entirely personal, charging him with violating the laws and the Constitution; and proposing no remedy for his imputed violation, nor for the act of which it was the subject. It was purely and simply a personal censure, a personal condemnation that was proposed, and to aggravate the proposition, it came from the suggestion of the bank directors' memorial to Congress. The combination was powerful. The bank itself was a great power, and was able to carry distress into all the business departments of the country; the political array against the President was unprecedented in point of number and great in point of ability.

Colonel Benton then enumerates a long list of Senators and members of the House with national reputations who rallied under Clay, Calhoun, and Webster for the condemnation of Jackson. He says:

The business of the combination was divided, distress and panic the object, and the parts distributed and separately cast to produce effect. The bank was to make the distress, a thing easy for it to do from its own moneyed power and its power over other moneyed institutions and money-dealers; also to get up distress meetings and memorials and to lead the public press. The politicians were to make the panic by the alarms which they created for the safety of the laws, of the Constitution, the public liberty, and the public money; and most zealously did each division of the combination perform its part, and for the long period of three full months.

At last the vote was taken, and the resolutions condemning General Jackson and his Secretary of the Treasury were adopted by a majority of 6, as the present resolutions condemning Grover Cleveland and his learned, upright, and honored Attorney-General will be, if there is a strict party vote and a full Senate. Benton continues:

And thus the resolutions were passed, and were nothing but an empty fulmination, a mere personal censure, having no relation to any business or proceeding in the Senate, and evidently intended for effect on the people. * * * Great reliance was placed upon that effect. It was fully believed, notwithstanding the experience of the Senate in Mr. Van Buren's case, that a Senatorial condemnation would destroy whomsoever it struck, even General Jackson. Vain calculation, and equally condemned by the lessons of history and by the impulsions of the human heart.

Sir, three years passed away, and in 1837 another and a far different vote was taken in the Senate of the United States. The people had been heard from, and the political complexion of the Senate had been changed on the very issue it had made with the Executive. The power of the haughty triumvirate from Kentucky, South Carolina, and Massachusetts was broken. In defeat and in humiliation they and their followers were compelled to witness their famous resolutions inclosed in open Senate with black lines of odium, and the face of their cherished record marred and disgraced forever by the ineffaceable brand: "Expunged by the order of the Senate."

May we not hope that this great lesson of history will have its uses at this time and for all the future; that the Senate on the one hand will take warning and avoid the fate of a far stronger Senatorial combination than the present, and that the present able and patriotic Chief Magistrate on the other hand will feel reassured that his only pathway of duty and of safety is to be found in the principles and policies of Andrew Jackson? Then will the various departments of this Government move together harmoniously, and all their great powers be called into action for the promotion of the common good, and not for the destruction of each other; then will the spirit of concord, good-will, and mutual respect prevail; and then no more will the ghastly apparition of the gory block, the gleaming ax, and the headless trunk of Charles I affright the soul of the Senator from Vermont or startle him from his seat. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. EVARTS. Mr. President, the topic of the resolutions upon which the votes of the Senate are to be divided, and which relate to a matter of considerable importance, at least in the relations between the Executive and the Senate, has formed a topic no doubt of either direct or of relative importance in the discussion which has been given to it; but as all that I shall have occasion to say will relate to that question itself, that vote which is to be taken, that resolution concerning the relations of the Executive and the Senate, and to the topics that are connected with the constitutional rules and the regulations of law upon the subject, the issue should be confined to what in our apprehension the matter in debate and in decision is.

The resolutions of the Judiciary Committee declare that the demand made by the Judiciary Committee for the papers described and under the circumstances in which the information is sought for should have been complied with by the Attorney-General, and that neither his duty nor the instruction of the President justified that refusal. In the minority report I can very briefly find what issue is joined, as I think, so far as a definite issue has been joined by this statement of opinion and duty, as the minority regard it, on the subject:

The minority admit, once for all, that any and every public document, paper, or record on the files of any Department, or in the possession of the President, relating to any subject whatever, over which either House of Congress has any grant of power, jurisdiction, or control under the Constitution, is subject to the call or inspection of either House for use in the exercise of its constitutional powers and jurisdiction.

Now, upon this assertion of the Judiciary Committee's resolutions, and upon this admission by the minority of that committee and in the name of the party represented on the other side of the Chamber, it would seem to one familiar that if confinement should be made to the issue there would be very little doubt as to what the conclusion of the Senate should be on these resolutions; but topics have been introduced, topics have been enlarged upon, topics have been made the subject of legal and constitutional argument and of political declamation which, as it seems to me, when they are compared with the issue that is to be decided, when they are compared with the assertion of the Judiciary Committee and the issue presented by the minority of that committee, all, or almost all, that has had this large and general scope and application of political opinion and political issues has no relation to our duty now.

It is said in the first place, and thus the proposition of the committee is sought to be avoided, that the papers called for can by no means touch any matter subject to the public action of the Senate. Let us look a moment at that proposition. Who is to determine in the first place that on a topic which the Senate has to do with it has a right to the inspection and use of papers in the Departments, but it has no such right when the Senate can not possibly touch or deal with any subject-matter to which those papers relate? Who is to determine in the first instance that the Senate may or may not explore and make use of papers that are on file? Certainly the Senate is the judge of that.

The Senate, as a component part of the Legislature represented in Congress, is not of limited jurisdiction. It is not confined to this or that topic. Whatever touches, in the language of one of the clauses of the Constitution, the common defense and the general welfare belongs to the two Houses of Congress. When, therefore, either House under its responsibilities and under the determination of a constitutional majority of votes on any subject in either of these Houses undertakes itself to deal with public documents and papers in the Departments, it deals with what belongs to the Government of the United States for use by the Congress of the United States, and upon its judgment of what its duties, its faculties, and its proposed actions relate to. And now for the first time is it found that a preliminary question arises when the Houses of Congress, one or both of them, have asked for papers on file, that there is a preliminary judgment to be exercised and to be final, and to be under the unlimited range of discretion and of personal judgment of the President, whether or not these papers that are described and exist as on the files or on deposit in the Departments are on the face of them papers that belong to the uses and for the purposes of the duty of the Houses of Congress.

Where is this preliminary line to be drawn? Who is to be patient under it? Who is to look in the face the two Houses of Congress in the illimitable range of their duty, dealing in the matters of the Departments, dealing with the matters there deposited and there preserved for the Government for its uses, for action in reference to the Government, and for no other purpose whatever? Who is at liberty to sift and cull out of these papers thus deposited, and to be accorded this prejudgment of the action of the two Houses of Congress? Who is to be this arbiter between the Government and the Congress to determine what shall be given and what shall be withheld?

I should like to find votes cast here on the other side of this alley upon that preliminary question. Give us the premises of the powers of the two Houses of Congress under the Constitution that are not disputed here—I mean the general powers—give us the constitution of the Departments; give us the arrangements of law regulating the action of these Departments; give us the fact that the papers we seek for are in the possession of the Department of Justice and the Attorney-General can lay his hand upon them, and then after that a peremptory instruction of the President can follow out these deposits and select from them those that are suitable for the inspection of the Houses; let it be conceded that it is not thus to be arbitrarily, thus capriciously, thus undutifully discharged by the President in this preliminary authority; let it be agreed that he means to send to the two Houses all that are useful and pertinent to every public use, how do you by that proposition but advance the most monstrous doctrine under the Constitution that the President is the judge of what the duty of the two Houses of Congress relates to, and the further question of what the papers would have to say and to show and to decide whether they were or were not important and interesting to the two Houses of Congress on the very matters that the Congress has authority over.

It would seem, then, that when the President of the United States directs the Attorney-General to withhold papers upon the sole ground that they belong to topics which do not interest or do not touch the duty of the Houses of Congress, you have established a subordination on the part of the two Houses of Congress to the personal judgment of the President, and unluckily a personal judgment about himself and his conduct and these evidences that we wish to inspect. It would not do, therefore, for the combatants on the other side of this question to rest this submissive reduction of the powers and authority of the two Houses of Congress, without exhibiting to the Senate some reason why, on their judgment, these papers should not be sought for; and the Senate itself should pass its judgment that it had no interest and duty in the premises that made it proper for it to look into these papers, or that if the Senate should draw a line of demarkation between public and private documents, between papers that were on file as a part of the possession and under the control of the Government, and papers that were there merely in the sense of a safe deposit for preservation, that the Senate itself must determine those questions and not submit to the will and the judgment, however upright and however intelligent, of the Executive foreclosing those questions from the judgment of the Senate.

Now, I will agree that it is a proper and a prominent topic of inquiry here in undertaking to press the power and authority of the Senate in respect of these papers whether it makes up its mind that the papers do or do not relate to any topic which the Senate either has the right or has the purpose further to pay attention to. It may also rightfully and properly exercise its own judgment whether it will pass upon the papers, not upon their evidence and their disclosures, but upon the preliminary judgment of the President whether they are public papers or private papers; and there we are not guided by any constitutional rule that may decide for us whether we have to do with the subject-matter, because when the criticism is upon the papers themselves that on the statement and on the judgment of the President they are not public papers we are surrendering, we are not able ourselves to determine from the papers themselves whether we shall insist upon or whether we shall submit to the treatment of the matter as no longer requiring our attention.

You will perceive, therefore, that on this last question the only possible constitutional treatment of this minor topic is for the President, for the Attorney-General to submit to the Senate in its confidential relation and under its obligation to look at these papers from its side of the question and determine whether these are trivial, whether these are casual, whether these do not touch a public interest or affect a public duty.

Unquestionably in the proper relations of courtesy between the Senate and the executive branches, especially with the President himself, if we are to have confidence in his judgment, upon his discrimination, only to be determined by inspection of the papers themselves, we are to be trusted by him under the same confidence, and the papers are to be regarded by the Senate, although they are found on the files and are not on public deposit as not being proper or useful there, all trivial in their relations, unimportant for our public duties; and then they may be returned without being made public or without being discussed at all.

The larger proposition is that the very subject-matter concerning which, in use upon which, these papers are sought does not relate to any public duty or any public right of the Senate. Why? Because of one thing, and alone one thing, for I am now not talking about the contents of the papers themselves or their public character, but that if they are public, if they are important, if they are to raise an opinion and a duty on the part of the Senate upon what is thus disclosed, we are not to ask for them, and are to be rebuffed if we ask for them, because they do not touch a public duty. That single reason, that single exception, is that they relate to a removal from office, and that removal from office under the Constitution is the sole act and the sole responsibility of the President of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The suspension.

Mr. EVARTS. I am referring now to removal. This is the larger proposition. I shall have occasion to consider that that question does not rule the determination under the civil tenure-of-office law. But that is the proposition. Why is the President of the United States at liberty to shut out from the examination of the Senate what papers have been before him bearing upon his exercise of the duty and the right, and the exclusive right and duty, if you please, for the present purpose, of removal. How does that touch the question? Are the two Houses of Congress not at liberty to look into the actual circumstances, motives, and action of public officers when they are acting within constitutional power? The whole province of the dominion of the great houses of Parliament, the great Houses of Congress, is on that very subject, not only of whether the Constitution has been transcended, but whether under the color of and submissive to the rules of the Constitution public duty has been perverted and the public interests have been sacrificed, although there was constitutional power.

You have then in advance a larger proposition than that which you contend for, that the removal from office is the sole, exclusive act and responsibility of the President, when you are obliged to maintain that every action of the President, of Secretaries, of generals, of heads of bureaus, of judges, or what not, executes a function that is within their constitutional power; and yet it can not be inquired into as to what papers, what motives, what influences were before them. Where is this great doctrine of the amenability of the President and all officers of the Government to the Houses of Congress under their great and general powers? Does it follow that because (having no relation of course to the topics that I am now speaking about) a discovery would lead to a duty on the part of the two Houses to proceed to draw the sword of the Constitution and execute by impeachment its power? Is it limited to the Congress first setting forth upon a measure of that kind that its power of general intelligence, of general information, of all the sources that are to be before them at their command in the Departments of the Government, can not be exercised? So far, then, as this question goes, the question of information is not at all encroached upon by the consideration whether the power of removal in its broadest constitutional statement is to preclude us from knowing what the facts concerning the action of the President are.

But let us look a little further at the question whether the power of removal is a constitutional power which the President can execute by his own choice and will, responsible of course under the general duties of the Executive to perform his duty and conform his action to the welfare of the country and the powers and authority of the Constitution.

The question of the power of removal was a great question. In my judgment it is a settled question. In my judgment also, if encouraged by the compliments I have received from our opponents I should express my own opinion, I think it was correctly decided, and that the power of removal under the Constitution belongs to the President without the participation of the Senate in what relates to the mere act of removal. How did that question arise? There was not any doubt left as to what the appointing power of the President was, either in recess or in session of the Senate, nor as to what the Senate's participation in that was. The question was whether a power of removal unconnected with appointment was exclusively lodged in the President of the United States or whether no such power existed, but could only be executed under and in connection with appointment to office.

That was the constitutional question, and it was a great one. The Constitution was silent; not a word had been said in it upon the subject. The whole topic that the framers of the Constitution had thought should engage their attention in the distribution of this executive power in appointments to office was satisfied with the determinations at which they arrived, and what were they? That the President was to have the power of appointing to office and commissioning; and how was he to have that power? I read from the seventh page of the report of the minority the clause from the Constitution there quoted:

He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint embassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States.

Here is the description of the offices in this latter clause accorded to the President:

And all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.

I ask your attention here, in anticipation of what I shall have to say in drawing the distinction between suspension and action under the civil tenure-of-office act and the constitutional power of removal to the point that outside of the enumerated offices the President has accorded to him no power of appointment except to offices that "shall be established by law." What is an office established by law except the duties, the permanence, the security, or the mutability of the office established?

It will be observed, then, that in the very granting power of appointment to the President, outside of enumerated offices, the authority is accorded to him to appoint to such offices as shall be established, and has therefore left entirely to the action of Congress all that belongs to the constitution of the office, its proper protection, its proper security, and the proper conditions of the useful and beneficial conduct of the office for the welfare of the country. The pertinency of this, Senators will do me the honor to remark, is when I shall come to draw the distinction between rights under the civil tenure-of-office act and the power of removal under the Constitution. You will observe that there was a condition of things when it was quite important regarding the participation of the Senate, which thus far was required in an appointment. There was the great situation of the Senate not being in session, and wisely and in a manner that has never been complained of, that interval of power was accorded sub modo to the President.

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of the next session.

That is very well for appointment. There came up two constitutional questions as to what were vacancies. One view was, that the vacancy must begin during the recess, and that one which continued over and which was in existence before the adjournment of the Senate was not one happening in recess. That was settled, and, as I think, wisely, in favor of the President's power, that whenever during a recess a vacancy was existing it was then happening, and happening from day to day until he filled it. And now arose the great question of removal. Vacancies might happen by death, by resignation, by condemnation, by disability to execute the duties; but what was to be done with the question of the President's power not now to deal with appointment but to deal with vacating the office? Was that a happening under the Constitution? Was that a power existing at all on the part of the President?

And the whole question about removal from office, and the whole debate between the great statesmen and the great thinkers in the First Congress was on that question, whether the President by his own act could vacate an office, or whether he could only displace an officer through an appointment except when there came to be a vacated office not by the act of the President vacating the office and existing during the recess. The debate turned upon that; and although that was the interesting point of the public welfare in reference to the long periods of recess and whether the President's hands were tied about vacating offices—although that was the large subject and the subject on which turned the debate, yet it did include the question of whether the President could vacate an office under his authority when the Senate was in session; and the reasoning and the decision covered both the recess and the session of the Senate. It was upon the constitutional authority of the President, not under his powers of appointment, for he was restricted in that regard, because his powers of appointment were constrained by the participation of the Senate to a great degree; but it was whether, under the general provisions of the Constitution which vested executive power and duties in the President and under the precise instruction that he should see that the laws are executed, there was carried a rightful duty to displace an officer that in his judgment should be displaced, or whether the consultation and the co-operation of the Senate should be obtained in that act. That was the whole debate and that was the whole decision. It was a great debate, a great question, and a great decision. My judgment, if again I may refer to it, as it has been referred to by others, is that it was decided not only in accordance with a judgment and with a practice that should be prevalent and not reopened, but a correct judgment upon the reasons and upon the interests under the Constitution which the topics involved were so ably displayed and discussed.

Now, sir, what is the act of removal, that in itself and of itself a President can exert and in regard to which the participation of the Senate can not share? It is the vacating the office. It is by that power of vacating the office during the recess that there happens to be a vacancy, and the only power to appoint in the recess is when there is a vacancy. Can he, then, by his own act vacate an office and make a vacancy? It is decided that he can, and for the reasons stated in the debate in the First Congress. Now comes the second question. The power of removal is the same question. If it belongs to the President's authority and duty under necessary rules of construction of the Constitution, if the emergency arises—less frequent, to be sure, more narrowly to be scrutinized, to be sure, when the Senate is in session—I mean the general judgment of the wise conduct of the Presidential office in that regard—he has the power and he can remove.

Now what was the question in the impeachment trial? Nothing but this: Whether the President could be impeached and could be convicted of having removed the head of one of the Departments from office without at the same time communicating to the Senate an appointment in his place and the vacating of the office made to depend upon the Senate's consent to the filling of it. Of course this question arose by the existence of the civil tenure-of-office act. No one would have pretended, as I think, that the action of the President in vacating an office was not in accordance with the settled view of the Constitution by the Congresses and by the action of the Government since. Although Mr. Webster, so great an authority on every question of law and of reason as he was, did not concur in the wisdom of the solution by which the rule was adopted in the debate of 1789, yet he conceded that it was settled and was the law of the land.

The President having removed, as he did, Mr. Stanton, the Secretary of War, undertook to treat the vacancy in the management by an appointee of his own as an ad interim appointment, conformably as I understood then and now to the general regulations governing that situation; that is to say, treating it in the same way as a vacancy that had arisen without an act of the President making the vacancy. The whole issue joined was that the President having that power and not the subject of impeachment upon that act under the Constitution, yet that that office had been placed under such constraint by the action of Congress as no longer left him to deal with the office so that it could be vacated by the will of the President.

I shall not repeat the discussion of that prolonged period so important, so interesting, so exciting; but it all grew out of that, that a separate act of removal under the Constitution by itself was no longer permitted in regard to the office under the circumstances that the President then dealt with, because the civil tenure-of-office act had imposed a durability of tenure upon the office.

My honorable friends the minority of the committee have done me the honor to quote in their report two passages from the impeachment trial as I was conducting it; and I must ask, without the least intention of criticising, the purpose of putting so close together two paragraphs that are very widely separated in the discussion to what is there stated on the fifteenth and sixteenth pages of their report. My statement of the subject of debate and the subject of decision is given in the first paragraph, and then a very short paragraph on my part quotes what I said in the second clause as dependent upon the grounds recited in the first. I am made to say:

If on these grounds you dismiss the President from this court convicted and deposed, &c.

You raise the great issue between the supremacy of the Constitution and the omnipotence of Congress. I think thirteen pages of argument culminating in this last paragraph are interposed between these that are thus stated together as the ground on which I made my proposition and the proposition itself. The second paragraph is but a mere conclusion in its relation to a description of the grounds upon which I made that proposition. It is taken no doubt correctly, but only as the closing lines of what I then declared was the issue that would be presented to the people of this country between the omnipotency of Congress and the supremacy of the Constitution; and I ask, what I otherwise would not wish to do, attention to the clause in which I really expressed my views of what the issue then raised was that would be so vital to the forces of the Constitution and the welfare of this country:

When, therefore, it is said and claimed that by force of a legislative enactment the President of the United States should not remove from office, whether the act of Congress was constitutional or not, that he was absolutely prohibited from removing from office, and if he did remove from office, although the Constitution allowed him to remove, yet the Constitution could not protect him for removing, but that the act of Congress, seizing upon him, could draw him in here by impeachment and subject him to judgment for violating the law, though maintaining the Constitution, and that the Constitution pronounced sentence of condemnation and infamy upon him for having worshiped its authority and sought to maintain it, and that the authority of Congress has that power and extent practically—you tear asunder your Constitution, and (if on these grounds you dismiss this President from this court convicted and deposed) you dismiss him the victim of the Congress and the martyr of the Constitution by the very terms of your judgment, and you throw open for the masters of us all in the great debates of an intelligent, instructed, populous, patriotic nation of freemen the division of sentiment to shake this country to its center, "the omnipotence of Congress" as the rallying cry on one side, and "the supremacy of the Constitution" on the other.

It was on that proposition that under the debates and under the doctrines of the Constitution as practiced on for so many years, if a President undertook to exercise that power of preferring the Constitution as he understood it, and he then should be drawn under the ax of impeachment and prevented from exercising peacefully and under the judgment of the arbiter of all questions under the Constitution, you did then by that transaction override the question whether the Constitution was or was not with the President, or was or was not with the Congress in that law, and that they, therefore, by this transcendent power of impeachment undertook to settle that question in face of the debates and in face of the practice of so many years under the Constitution you did really undertake the power of deposing a President although the law was unconstitutional; and so it would be held.

I believe no greater question could have been presented in the politics of our country than that, and I never have ceased to think that no greater and better result in the history of our Constitution than the avoidance of that issue was reached by the determination of the impeachment. But, sir, President Johnson did put himself on the power of removal, and he met the consequence. I sufficiently commented in that impeachment trial upon all the topics, as I think, that could rightfully bear on the questions as they were presented to my mind. I will not repeat them.

But what is the question here? President Cleveland has not removed Mr. Duskin; he has not asserted a power under the Constitution to remove him. He has not nominated as of his action the newly proposed district attorney to fill a vacancy—not in the least. What was open to a President of the United States? Does any one pretend that the President can enlarge the appointing power, that he can curb the Senate's participation in the act of appointment? No; it is for the President to determine when he deals with an office and an officer for himself to decide whether he will exercise a power that belongs to him alone and then perform another act that does not belong to him alone, but belongs to him with the participation of the Senate, and the latter is all that is talked of. That is not this situation. How, then, is there any difference between the ordinary condition of the Senate in dealing with the question proposed by the nomination of Mr. Whoever-he-may-be in place of Mr. Duskin, suspended—how does that differ from what it would have been if the President proposed the appointment of A B in the place of C D, to be removed? That is the constitutional question. Whether, therefore, the President sends a nomination of A B to be appointed in place of C D, removed by the act of appointing A B, it is one dissevered, unparted constitutional act of the President of appointing by and with the consent of the Senate, making the vacancy by the appointment. The Senate, therefore, is appealed to itself to perform one single, constitutional, inseparable, and indivisible constitutional power, which is to say, "We unite, concur, Mr. President, in your single, inseparable, and indivisible, one Presidential act." Is there any escape from that?

That was not Andrew Jackson's case. That was not the case debated by the fathers of the Constitution in the Congress of 1789. Their decision did not determine or define in the least what was the single, indivisible action of the President proposed for the concurrence of the Senate, to wit, the removal of A B to be removed by the act in which you concur. We then by the Constitution, we, by the very necessity of the act of the President, which with him is one and indivisible in the mode in which he executes his office, are invited to perform a single and indivisible act, our concurrence; and what happens? If the Senate concurs, by one vote, with one breath, the Senate concurs in displacing and confirms in appointing; and if the Senate refuses, the Senate leaves the nominee unappointed and the officer undisturbed.

It seems, then, to me that constitutional distinctions have not been drawn between this and the action on which so great debates have arisen. As I am not now discussing the civil tenure-of-office act, I will agree that under the Constitution the President can vacate without the participation of the Senate, and then if you please for the purpose of bare argument I will agree that we ought not to inquire too closely about it. But he has not done any such thing. He has undertaken to appoint and remove by one act turning upon one reason governing the matter, and we concur by one act, one reason governing the composite attempt of putting in one man and turning out the other. How? By putting the other in.

Now, Mr. President, I have but little to say upon the constitutional question and upon the practical application of this matter under the civil tenure-of-office act. I will only treat of it as it now applies, and that is that the civil tenure-of-office act undertook to impose upon the officers which it embraced within its operation a certain permanent durability; and that was that these offices with these fixed terms should not have the term shortened except by the concurrent action of the President and the Senate. Very well. Before I discuss that in its general features and its constitutional impugnment let me call your attention to this: The provision was intended to meet the case that although these offices should be permanent for the terms created, not capable of disturbance except by the concurrence of the Senate and of the President, yet they met the same question which appealed to the good sense and the necessary provision in the Constitution itself, and that is what is to happen in the recess. You are now imposing by law a limitation not under the Constitution which has been already defined and construed by the Government, but this one, and therefore Congress undertook to provide and in the act of 1869 (which is all that I shall look at) it has provided that the President shall have the power of suspending, and then an incumbent of the office may be designated and its duties discharged until the end of the next session of the Senate. In other words, there should be given a suspensive power not existing under the Constitution at all, never dreamed of for a moment as belonging to a President by force of the Constitution, not dreamed of now, not insisted upon for a moment on the other side, that that suspensive power should be permitted to prevail for the public interest and be at the disposal of the President during the recess until the end of the next session of the Senate.

What did that do? Did it vacate the office? Of course it did not vacate the office. When a man is suspended in an office his office is not vacant and he is not out of it, but his exercise of function is arrested. Is the man named to execute the function in office? There can not be two in one office. Is it pretended that the terms of the tenure-of-office act put the man into the office? No, that is not contended for on the other side.

What then does happen? This duty of the President, accorded to him on the same reasons that an office should not be maintainable in the absence of the Senate which ought to be vacated in the sense of the exercise of function, is accorded; and then when you come to the end of the session of the Senate, if the office has not become vacant as to the first officer and filled with one under the appointment with the consent of the Senate, when the Senate rises the intermediate, the ad interim discharger of function disappears, and the officer returns and is in office. Nobody has disputed that on the other side.

How, then, under the civil tenure-of-office act does this nomination of Burnett in any constitutional point of view differ from the nomination of Burnett if Duskin was in office and not suspended? I should like to know. I should like to have some constitutional lawyer draw a line. The office is not vacant. The nomination is not by description of an office that is vacant, nor is it a description of an officer who has been removed, nor who is to be removed, in terms at all except by the fiat of the Senate, which says that Burnett shall be appointed.

When, therefore, the formula by which the nomination of Burnett is transmitted to take a place that has been held, that is held, by Duskin the fact that a proper description of the conduct of the President and of the situation of Duskin is correctly and accurately followed, that the nomination is made in the name of a man in office who has been suspended; and the constitutional act proposed, and the constitutional act to be taken by the Senate is precisely the same, unaffected by the ad interim occurrence and the proposition in the nomination that the man who is nominated is in the place of a man holding office but who has been suspended.

With regard to the civil tenure-of-office act I may be permitted to say a word, because I have been referred to for constitutional opinions. I might say that when counsel are urging and pressing propositions in view and in aid of a defendant in charge, those are scarcely judicial opinions; but I have no occasion to find in the whole record of my argument any statement of constitutional opinions to which I do not agree. What is the constitutional question, in my judgment, about the tenure-of-civil-office act? I shall state it; I have never been able to express the opinion that the law was unconstitutional. I have never approved of it as a matter of wisdom, nor have I approved of the action under it in the entanglements between this branch of the Government and the Executive; but that belongs to Congress to determine. If I shall ever have occasion to vote in that relation, I shall discharge that duty. But when it is proposed to me as a matter of constitutional opinion that that law is unconstitutional, I must say that I have never been able to see how it should be so denounced. There is but one principle upon which it can be denounced as unconstitutional.

It is clear that the establishment of offices belongs wholly to Congress to shape the duration, the trusts confided, and the manner of their discharge and their accountability. All these belong to Congress because they are all by the very statement of the term a part of the office that is constituted. I have never been able to see that Congress could not make an office that was irremovable by anybody under the Government. I leave out, of course, the doctrine and the causes of impeachment, we having in those cases found in the particular constitution and duties of this or that office a prevalent term accorded, and a subtraction of the Presidential power, of his will in vacating the office. One instance was read by our honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], the case of the Director of the Mint; there is a similar provision, I believe, in regard to the Comptroller of the Currency; and that is that they should hold the office for five years, and that they should be removed by the President, and only by him, for reasons communicated to the Senate. That duty was discharged by the President and nobody found any fault with it, not that we concurred that the excellent Director of the Mint should have been removed, or that, if you please, the equally good new incumbent should have taken his place; but it might have been better in the public interest that there should have been no change in such an office as that; it is implied in the will of Congress that it shall not be open to the mere exercise of Presidential authority.

But if you can do that, why can you not make the office irremovable for five years? It is a mere question of discretion with legislative power, weighing on one side the inconvenience of the removability and on the other side the inconveniences of a permanent tenure. However, when Congress has determined it, it is an office under the Constitution, and only so by the power of Congress to make it just as Congress has decided it will make it.

When, therefore, the power of appointment is to be exercised under this primary authority of the President, to wit, that he shall appoint by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to offices which shall be established by law, the constitution of the office fixes the place the officer can fill; and when he fills it, by the legislative constitution of the office it is filled, and can not be vacated until the end of the term. What other construction can be put on the Constitution than that, because there is a power of removal under the Constitution as a part of the President's duty to see that the laws are executed under that instrument, which is accorded to him now when the offices are durante bene placito, during pleasure, he can vacate them without consulting the Senate? Does that mean that in this great country of ours, widening, expanding, and becoming more and more manifold in every progress of time, every office must be durante bene placito; that instead of the power of the office being in Congress and the power of the President to appoint to such offices as we shall establish, we can establish no office that is not at his pleasure, at his disposal? That is the whole and only constitutional question, as I respectfully submit, regarding the constraints of the civil tenure-of-office act.

It may be said, it has been said, it was argued when these laws passed, it was argued during the impeachment agitation, it is argued here, that these laws, although passed with an authority over the tenure of the office and its durability, yet it was but a cover and a mode of thwarting the Presidential authority in dealing with offices. That does not make it unconstitutional. Fortunately, conceding everything that has been suggested for the purpose of this argument on my part, it has nothing to do with constitutionality. If there is power in Congress to give a durability of tenure from good motives, it does not become unconstitutional because it may have been done under bad motives. No court can so decide. It is only in the wide forum of popular opinion, of reason, of what should constrain and what should control and what should be free in the exercise of authority in legislative power that there can be such discussion as this last measure I have suggested.

It is for that reason that whatever repugnance I have had and still have to the civil tenure-of-office act, however much I would regard it as desirable that it had not been in force in times past, and that it should not continue in force, I have never been able to determine that the conditions regarding the establishment of office were not open to the will of Congress; for I could see no stopping-place in departing from that proposition which would not have made all the scheme and power of office and duty in office subject by very necessary and absolute conditions to its being only during pleasure.

I have a single observation to make in regard to what has been suggested by the honorable Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] who presented the minority report and spoke of as an incident in the history of this office. It seems that when the nomination of Burnett was sent in the message communicated the nomination as being to take the place of Duskin, suspended. That, of course, meant that Duskin was in office but was suspended, and it was so understood. Subsequently, and before the action of the Senate upon the proposition as submitted by the President, by expiration of the term of his office, Duskin passed out of office; and the honorable Senator from Alabama says that now it is only a moot question. Well, if we are to go back to the rules of law and of pleading and distinctions between cases presented that have ceased their importance and those that still subsist as important, let me call the attention of the Senate and of the honorable Senator from Alabama to the question as to whose fault it is and by what circumstance it is that we are now passing upon the proposition as it was submitted to the Senate by the President. As every lawyer knows, certainly every lawyer as good as the Senator from Alabama, issues are always determined upon the issues as they are joined, and unless some attention is paid to an occurrence between the disposition and the proposition the proposition is disposed of in the decision. We are acting upon this question. It has not been removed from our records. We can not pass upon it in any way but this, that we are consenting to the appointment of a man in the place of one now in office and suspended. If, when the situation was changed, the President had sent in his nomination of Burnett in place of Duskin, whose term of office has expired, then we should have been able to act upon that, and this instance would not have presented the debate that has continued.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But we should have had the same right to know what the condition of the office was as before.

Mr. EVARTS. To that I agree, but the complaint is that we are going on.

Now, to go back to our early learning, whenever an issue joined between plaintiff and defendant has been changed by some post hdc occurrence, there was a very familiar process by which the defendant pleaded, in the old law lingo, puis darrein continuance; that is, that since issue was joined this or that fact has occurred which has changed and superseded the trial. Why does not the President change the situation? If the question is not any longer one of removal in office but of appointment to an office that is now vacant, let our record preserve that state of facts, and then my vote and your vote will be conformed to the question presented by nominating A B to take the office in the place of C D, whose term of office has expired. My vote and your vote now upon the record before the Senate must turn upon the question whether you concur or refuse to concur, whether I concur or refuse to concur, not in the appointment of a person to take an office where the last incumbent's term has expired, but of one who has been suspended.

Now, Mr. President, a few words on this general question, which so interests, as I think, the plain people of this country as well as the constitutional lawyers and debaters of the Houses of Congress. I understand, every one understands, that it was and is announced and maintained in the name of the Democratic party, and for and in the name and action of the President, who, as the report of the minority says, was elected President upon the declaration that office is a public trust. Let me be correct about this matter. The second paragraph of the minority report begins with this clause:

> The President was elected on the declaration that civil office was a public trust.

The President does not speak as from a pulpit nor from a professor's chair; he speaks as President of the United States, that this public trust is to be exercised by him, and in this very matter of offices is to be controlled in the interest of the public and in repugnance to the mere shifting of office-holders by the complexions of politics and party changes. Therefore, when a President of the United States becomes President upon that proposition, and when that proposition has been insisted upon in the terms which are quoted in the reports, then the President is by great and public duty held to the point that when he makes changes in office, if he anticipates the action of the Senate by acting himself in the recess, if he anticipates at any stage of proceedings by two months, or three months, or six months the change of office, it means either that his public trust in respect of that office and that treatment of the office is his treatment, and that mere political reasons are not in accordance with his construction of that public trust; or he is to commit himself by the announcement of suspensions, as he would of removals, upon some duty connected with the officer and with the office, and places him proscribed to his fellow-countrymen as not removed on political discriminations by the triumph of one party over another, but because, as the President has announced, the public service did not permit his continuance in office.

Whenever the President executes that power himself, of course he is open only to the criticism that belongs to the act and the judgment of his fellow-countrymen and of the depositaries of constitutional power under the Government, but when with that announcement of his that the place is not to be vacated for political reasons or on the triumph of one party over the other, he proposes that the Senate shall concur in what he can not do without concurrence, we either commit ourselves by our concurrence in the rule of judgment that he has announced, or we must condemn him as using only idle and loud-sounding phrases.

If it be not so, if as every respect to the President requires us to give, he meant that his public trust in respect of public offices and their filling must be governed by the public nature of the trust, and when in respect of political occasions of removal the very matter has been pronounced in definite terms that affiliation with a political party is harmless and praiseworthy, that being a partisan is not a ground of objection, but that offensive partisanship stamps with a scandal the office as it has been performed, and affixes a stigma upon the officer who has so exerted it, then if his proposition is written between the lines under his public declarations when he asks us to confirm Burnett and remove Duskin, for that is our constitutional act, when we are asked to concur in that, we are entitled to know all that is implied by that action.

If we find that in the public papers there is evidence of faults and shortcomings of conduct that except the conduct of this officer from that of a mere Republican doing his duty to his party and his office, when we are to concur in the judgment that is pronounced, when the grounds on which it is pronounced are declared by the President of the United States to us, and we are desired to concur in that judgment, are we to act in the dark about that? Are we to say that all this fine talk before the election and all this proud announcement since the election we are to cast aside as idle and foolish, and convict the President and convict the Democratic party of having used merely words of hypocrisy without meaning to execute the promises? We ought to know that we have some ground upon which we can throw this opprobium and reproach in the face of the Democratic party; and if we are to condemn our Republican officers and their conduct of office, and their scandalous partisanship, without knowing what the facts are as far as we can find them out, or if when we have found them out we do not choose to concur in this single act of confirming Burnett, which covers then by our act the removal of the last incumbent, if we are to do it in that way, we want to know that we can be justified in the judgment and complaint of the party, of the officer, of the common sense of the American nation.

For myself, sir, while the proposition is conceived and submitted by the President in these terms, that I ask you to concur in the emptying of the office by turning out Duskin by your act in confirming Burnett, I will not do it in the dark if I can get any light, and I will not do it after I have got the light unless I am willing to be responsible for my participating act in the transaction and its result.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I do not propose to occupy any very extensive portion of the time of the Senate in the discussion of the resolutions which are now before the body.

The speech of the Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] has placed this subject upon a new and different ground. I understand the honorable Senator to state that he proposes to measure the constitutional duties of a Senator by the proposition which the President of the United States may make in regard to the subject. Burnett is not to be confirmed because Duskin's removal has been placed upon improper grounds, and because he has been removed for reasons not satisfactory to the honorable Senator, he announces to the American people that he will not advise and consent to the appointment of a competent successor to perform the duties imposed by law on the office.

If this be the ground upon which this controversy is placed before the people, it justifies all that was said by Mr. Webster and by the great expounders of the Constitution heretofore on the attempt of the Senate to assume the executive power of the Presidential office and its functions by the majority of the Senate. That has been the danger from the beginning of this Government until now resulting from this attempt on the part of the Senate to curb the power of the people and the people's President, elected by them and responsible to them, by the unconstitutional will of a majority of this Chamber.

The President gives reasons not satisfactory to them, or refuses to give them for the performance of an executive act, the appointment of an incumbent to office, and a great representative of a great party declares that he will not confirm a successor because those reasons are not satisfactory to him, or because the President refuses to give him any information as to the papers on which he formed his opinion, or as to the fact whether he had or had not any papers or communication on the subject. The Senator from New York must know the reasons, the grounds, the evidence upon which an officer, who by the Constitution is independent of the Senator and the Senate, co-ordinate with them, chosen by the people and responsible to them in a term of office shorter than that of a Senator, has proceeded, or he will not perform the duties of a Senator, which themselves are expressly required to be independent and co-ordinate, without control, without interference by the President, until the Senate is satisfied that the President has performed his independent duties in a manner satisfactory to the Senate. Why the honorable Senator in the great argument on the impeachment of Andrew Johnson to which he has referred did not so regard the duty of the Senate and of the President of the United States. In that argument on the impeachment of President Johnson, which brought reputation and fame to him, he used this language:

> The Constitution of the United States never intended so to coerce and constrain the consciences and the duties of men as to bring them into the position of judges between themselves and another branch of government in regard to matters of difference between themselves and that other branch of government in matters which concerned wholly the partition of authority under the Constitution between themselves and that other department of the Government.

Now, sir, apply that to the question before the Senate. The President of the United States conceives that it is within his province and his duty to withhold certain papers concerning the manner in which he has performed or is to perform an executive function from the Senate. He is an independent, co-ordinate department of this Government, without connection with this body except in certain defined and specified instances, of which this is not one. The majority of the Senate demand of him that he shall submit his judgment to them.

The Senator from New York said, and properly said, that the Constitution never made a conflict of authority, it never gave an independent co-ordinate department of this Government a discretion and a power to perform an act and to decide for themselves in regard to it, and also required another co-ordinate and independent department or officer of this Government to come into direct and positive conflict with it in regard to that discretionary duty; and unquestionably the Constitution must be so construed. This is a primary law of construction that must be applied to that instrument.

But that is not all. The Senator from New York said that he did not believe this tenure-of-office law to be unconstitutional, but in the trial of Andrew Johnson he used the following language:

Now, this question comes up in this form: The power of removal is and always has been claimed and exercised by the Executive in this Government separately and independently of the Senate. Until the act of March 2, 1867, the actual power of removal by the Senate never has been claimed. Some constructions upon the affirmative exercise of the power of appointment by the Executive have at different times been suggested, and received more or less support, tending to the conclusion that thus the Senate might have some hold of the question of removals; and now this act, which we are to consider more definitely hereafter, does not assume in terms to give the Senate a participation in the distinct and separate act of an executive nature, the removal from office.

Indeed the manner that the Congress has dealt with the subject is quite peculiar. Unable, apparently, to find adequate support for the pretension that the Senate could claim a share in the distinct act of removal or vacating of office, the scheme of the law is to change the tenure of office, so that removability as a separate and independent governmental act, by whomever to be exerted, is obliterated from the power of this Government. Look at that, now, that you do absolutely strike out of the capacity and resources of this Government the power of removing an officer as a separate executive act—I mean an executive act in which you participate. You have determined by law that there shall be no vacation of an office possible, except when and as and by the operation of completely filling it; and so far have you carried that principle that you do not even make it possible to vacate it by the concurrence of the Senate and the President; but you have deliberately and firmly determined that the office shall remain full as an estate and possession of the incumbent, from which he can be removed under no stress of the public necessity except by the fact occurring of a complete appointment for permanent tenure of a successor concurred in by the Senate and made operative by the new appointee going into and qualifying himself in the office.

This seems at the first sight a very extraordinary provision for all the exigencies of a Government like ours with its forty thousand officers, whose list is paraded here before you, with their twenty-one millions of emoluments, to show the magnitude of the great prize contended for between the Presidency and the Senate. It is a very singular provision, doubtless, that in a Government which includes under it forty thousand officers, there should be no governmental possibility of stopping a man in or removing him from an office, except by the deliberate succession of a permanent successor, approved by the Senate, and concurred in by the appointee himself going to the place and qualifying and assuming its duties.

The Senator from New York at that time denied both the principle of the constitutionality of the act and by the strongest arguments demonstrated its inexpediency. But it was not my purpose to elaborate upon the well-established proposition. Commencing with the celebrated debate of 1789, John Adams declared, Mr. Webster has declared, all the great men of the country have at different times declared the conclusive force of this debate in settling the President's absolute right and power of removal.

The people—

Says Mr. Adams—

then, ought to consider the President's office as the indispensable guardian of their rights. I have ever, therefore, been of opinion that the electors of President ought to be chosen by the people at large. The people can not be too careful in the choice of their Presidents; but when they have chosen them they ought to expect that they will act on their own independent judgments, and not be wheedled or intimidated by factious combinations of Senators, Representatives, heads of Departments, or military officers. The exclusive principle which has been adopted and too openly avowed by both our great divisions when the pendulum has swung to their side is a principle of faction, and not of honest party. It is intolerance! It is despotism! It destroys the freedom of the press, the freedom of elections, the freedom of debate, the freedom of deliberation, the freedom of private judgment.

And as long as the Senate shall be determined to negative all but their own party, the President can have no will or judgment of his own. I most earnestly entreat all parties to reconsider their resolutions on this subject.

Mr. Madison said in the debate of 1789:

Vest this power (removal) in the Senate jointly with the President, and you abolish at once that great principle of unity and responsibility in the executive department which was intended as the security of liberty and the public good.

Take the other supposition, that the power should be vested in the Senate. * * * It is declared by the Constitution that we may by law vest the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of Departments, the power of removal being incidental. When does this terminate? If you begin with the subordinate officers they are dependent on their superior, he on the next, and he on whom—on the Senate, a permanent body, a body by its particular mode of election in reality exerting power, a body possessing that proportion of aristocratic power which the Constitution no doubt thought wise to be established in the system. * * *

Shall we trust the Senate, responsible to individual Legislatures, rather than the person responsible to the whole community? * * * Instead of keeping the departments of Government distinct you make an executive out of one branch of the Legislature. You make the Executive a two-headed monster. * * * You link together two branches of the Government which the preservation of liberty requires to be constantly separated.

I could multiply these distinguished authorities. I hold in my hand a brief of them collected with great care by a lady of learning and study, the correspondent of the Louisville Courier-Journal, but I will not now extend them.

Now, sir, what is the attitude of the question before the Senate? The President of the United States claims the right to withhold certain papers. Are those papers important to the public service? Is it necessary for the performance of any duties important to the safety of the Union that they should be had? Access to them is open to every member of this body. The President has not concealed them. They consist of letters addressed to Senators or letters addressed to the President of the United States, containing, if you choose, charges, statements, sometimes false and sometimes true, in regard to individuals who are either in office or applicants for office. Of what service is that to the Senate or to the country?

Suppose a thousand citizens in their private capacity have communicated with the President and expressed to him their opinions, whether they are correct or incorrect opinions. Suppose they have slandered, as doubtless they have oftentimes, persons who are applicants for office. Of what importance to this body or to the country is the possession of such papers? How does this false accusation concern the Senate or the President? Can you assume before the President has declared it that the false statement has been the ground of his action? Even if we were to concede all that has been claimed by the Senator from New York or by the Senator from Vermont, and say that the Departments are filled with false and libelous charges, has the Senate the right or the power to take action in respect to it? Is it brought here to sit in judgment upon the calumnies that may be made by private individuals, whether to Senators or to the President?

Why, sir, it is manifest that they have no part in the performance of the constitutional duties imposed upon the Senate. They neither make the proposed aspirant for office worthy or unworthy. The fact that some man has slandered his predecessor, if admitted, if all that is claimed and asked for here is admitted in the argument, it furnishes no ground in reason that the Senate could stand upon.

I will concede for the argument's sake to the majority that there are slanders and libels and false accusations.

Is the Senate the tribunal to which the private citizen must come for the vindication of his character? That is the proposition of the Senator from New York and that is the proposition of these resolutions. The Senate has higher duties to perform. Is it to arraign the President of the United States because he says "these papers are my property; I may and I may not, as my judgment, not yours, indicates attach importance to them. If I do as I see fit, and say that I believe Mr. A in his statement, and you the Senate say that you do not believe him, I have the right to say so, and to attach such importance as I think proper to it. If I see fit to say I think it better for the public interest that this communication from a citizen addressed to me, or to a Senator, should sleep in the silence of oblivion," can the Senate deny that a Senator or the President has the right to dispose of the communications addressed to him, relating to his own action, as he sees fit? And yet, with all the grave argument on this subject, that is the one proposition and the only question before this body, whether the President of the United States has the right to deposit a paper of this character in the Departments here for his use and reference, if he sees fit to use them, or whether the Senate may require him to send those papers here whether he has based his official action upon them or not.

A public document is one recording facts which have been inquired into or taken notice of for the benefit of the public by an agent authorized and accredited for the purpose. (Rapalye and Lawrence's Law Dictionary.)

The President has not said that he had inquired into these letters, or even read or taken notice of them.

In Miller and Austin, 6 Sergeant & Rawle's Reports, 221, C. J. Tilghman, one of the most eminent judges of this country, said:

I protest against one of the principles contended for, that it must be presumed to be an official paper because found in the office and among official papers.

The Senator from New York says we want the evidence. By the Constitution the President of the United States is not an instrument at the will of the Senate to gather testimony for or against individuals, either suspended or not suspended. Why argue this question? The power of removal, if it exists, must of necessity carry with it everything that is included in a removal. As the whole is greater than the part, it has ever been held that a power to cover a whole subject, an entire power, covers any part of that power.

A suspension, a temporary deprivation of office, the incumbent of which is subject to be removed at the pleasure of another, is unquestionably contained within the power of removal. And when the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] yesterday answered the question propounded by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] that when the President of the United States had proposed to the Senate a nomination, the message proposing that nomination in place of another person removed, that such a removal took effect upon the nomination of his successor, it seemed to excite some degree of gratification with the Senator from Vermont as an admission of some flaw in the argument.

But, sir, the President, if he have the power of removal, may propose and fix the time when it takes effect, and he alone who has the power to remove can determine the time when it is to take effect; and when he sends to the Senate and says "I propose to remove A B at such a time," whether it be when his successor is confirmed or at some other time, it does not import anything to the argument that the Senate can derive any power from his proposition to share in the power of removal, nor does it indicate that the President proposes to the Senate that it shall share this power with him.

Why, sir, is it not surprising that these great men, these Senators of learning and capacity here, should propose the idea that the Senate of the United States can derive constitutional power from an abdication by the President of his rights, can claim before the country that a Constitution can be made or unmade because the President does or does not perform his constitutional duty? This is an idea that does not belong to this age and this century. We can not change this great instrument upon which the hopes and prosperity of sixty million people depend because any officer, high or low, fails to perform the constitutional duty imposed upon him. It is scarcely necessary for this proposition to be argued or considered.

What, then, is there involved in this discussion? I confess I think it is far beneath the dignity of this body. I confess I think it is wholly foreign to the public interests that we should be in a contention here with the Chief Magistrate of this country, not in regard to any usurpation of power, not in regard to any failure of public duty in a constitutional sense, but as says the Senator from New York, because the President has not conformed, as he regards it, to the policy declared in his message, and for which he admits he is responsible, not to the Senate, but to the people of the United States.

What then is the question? It is that there are certain papers, certain letters, which it is believed or supposed may concern the conduct of some public officer, and the President and the Attorney-General reply, "I send you all papers concerning this office which I consider important; there are other papers on the files to which I have attached no importance, which are personal to me, and these papers I do not think it is for the public interest should be sent to the Senate."

The majority of the Senate say that unless these papers, the purport of which we are not advised of, unless these letters which concern nothing that we have any right to believe is important to the public interest, that unless these letters to the President of the United States, which he regards as private and personal, are sent here, we will stop the further progress of the Government, we will not advise or consent to the appointment of the men whom the President shall select to execute the laws, we will abdicate our constitutional function. Why, Mr. President, we may admit all the heresies which have been maintained in this debate by the Senators on the other side; we may admit that this body with its six years tenure of power, removed from the people and not responsible to them, this body elected by a small assemblage of representative men in the different States, has the power of restraining the people's choice, the President, elected by and responsible to them; we may admit all that is claimed in the assumption by the Senate of this executive function; we may admit that the tenure-of-office law is constitutional and in force; we may admit that the Senate alone, without the force of law or the concurrence of the other House, has the complete right to control and appropriate and use all the public documents and all that relates to the public service in the different Departments of the Government, and yet we must concede that there is some materiality, some relevancy of testimony to the end that is required.

We can not contend because of all that, if it should be true, that a private letter to the President in the Departments is subject to the control of the Senate. Still less can we maintain, as is required by this argument and this proposition here, that we shall fail to confirm a man nominated by the President because this private letter is not produced by him. The distinctions taken by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] yesterday on that subject are so plain and apparent that they leave no ground for doubt or reasoning.

But, sir, what does Mr. Webster say in regard to the resolutions now before the Senate, this assumption of power on the part of a majority of this body to control the President of the United States, not in reference to his appointments to office, but in reference to a power admitted even in their own law, his power of suspension?

The Senate proposes to inquire into the grounds and the evidences upon which the President of the United States removed this man Duskin. They wished to know what was the evidence, although Duskin can never be before the Senate, although it is a mere technical question, as was said by the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from New York, that an issue had been joined in the past, and therefore by analogy to the practice of the courts (but no such analogy exits) it could be heard now. We are here charged by the Constitution with an inquiry into the fitness of Burnett to hold the office for which the President has nominated him; we are charged on our oaths with advising or consenting to his nominations, or refusing to do so if he is unworthy, and yet we are told that we must inquire into the evidence of Duskin's unworthiness. What did Mr. Webster say on that subject?

> It would be unfortunate, indeed, if our line of constitutional action were to vibrate backward and forward according to our opinions of persons, swerving this way to-day from undue attachment, and the other way to-morrow from distrust and dislike. This may sometimes happen from the weakness of our virtues or the excitement of our passions; but I trust it will not be coolly recommended to us as the rightful course of public conduct.

> If we will abolish the distinction of branches, and have but one branch; if we will abolish jury trials, and leave all to the judge; if we will then ordain that the legislator shall himself be that judge; and if we will place the executive power in the same hands, we may readily simplify government.

As these resolutions propose, the President shall not judge in regard to papers that are sent to him, addressed to him personally, advising as to his executive action, but the Senate shall judge, and if they judge differently from him they will not perform their constitutional function. Said Mr. Webster:

> We may easily bring it to the simplest of all possible forms, a pure despotism. But a separation of departments, so far as practicable, and the preservation of clear lines of division between them, is the fundamental idea in the creation of all our constitutions; and, doubtless, the continuance of regulated liberty depends on maintaining those boundaries.

Now, the Senator from Vermont tells us that the boundaries are not to be maintained, that the President of the United States may not even judge not only as to what is a public record, but as to the propriety of communicating to this body a communication addressed to him advising him as to what he shall do in regard to this person or that person; and the pretense is asserted here that the character of somebody is impugned by some private letter of a private citizen addressed to the President of the United States upon which no action has been predicated by him, none announced by him, which has had no vitality or life given to it. Why, sir, there is neither reason nor argument nor right in this. The great party that is represented on the other side should not engage in such a purpose. There is some other object behind this. Neither do the majority in the Senate approve or believe that by their condemnation of the President the people of the United States will concur in that condemnation. It is no doubt for the purpose and the single purpose of retaining in position the party representatives who are now there and preventing their removal from office.

It has been asserted here that the President of the United States may not interpret the Constitution of the United States for himself. These resolutions assert that the Senate must interpret it for him. The great plea in the case of Andrew Johnson, in which the Senator from New York performed so famous a part, was that the Senate, upon a presentation by the House, could sit in judgment and convict the President of the United States because he had interpreted this tenure-of-office act according to his own idea of its constitutionality. That was the question, and the judgment was that he could not be convicted; and the argument of the Senator from New York, the abundant and able argument, the exhaustive argument, was that he could not be convicted for interpreting an act of Congress as to its constitutionality according to his own judgment and his own opinion.

Why, sir, Mr. Lincoln, the great light of the Republican party, declared that these resolutions were wrong, were improper, that he had a right to construe the Constitution for himself. More especially is this true in regard to so small a matter as the question of the surrender to the Senate upon their demand of papers which the President declares have no concern with the public duty he performed, the appointment of a successor to Mr. Duskin. Mr. Lincoln said:

> I do not forget the position assumed by some that constitutional questions are to be decided by the Supreme Court, nor do I deny that such decisions must be binding in any case upon the parties to a suit, as to the object of that suit, while they are also entitled to a very high respect and consideration in all parallel cases by all other departments of the Government; and while it is obviously possible that such decision may be erroneous in any given case, still the evil effect following it being limited to that particular case, with the chance that it may be overruled and never become a precedent for other cases, can better be borne than could the evils of a different practice.
> At the same time the candid citizen must confess that if the policy of the Government upon the vital questions affecting the whole people is to be irrevocably fixed by the decisions of the Supreme Court, the instant they are made, as in the ordinary litigation between parties in personal actions, the people will have ceased to be their own masters, having to that extent practically resigned their Government into the hands of that eminent tribunal.

Even in regard to the Supreme Court, much less in regard to a majority of the Senate without the concurrence of the House of Representatives, it has been held in the uniform practice of this country, and properly held, that for the President to surrender, for the two Houses of Congress to surrender, or either of the co-ordinate branches of Government to surrender their right to interpret the Constitution for themselves, would be a surrender of the independent and co-ordinate character of that department of the Government to the other. With what reason then can we consider this question in the light of the resolutions of the majority?

Never was there presented or can there be presented a proposition so totally devoid of reason and argument. Even the bright intellect and the learning of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Vermont can not cover the enormity of these propositions. They demand that the Executive shall abdicate not only his executive power of removal, which is admitted by the Senator from Massachusetts, and by the Senator from New York, to exist in him under the Constitution, but they demand that he shall surrender his right to his judgment as to his constitutional power; they demand that as to a mere paper the significance of which is not affirmed, the contents of which are not known, addressed to him personally and relating to his executive action which they acknowledge can not be revised or supervised or altered or affected—they demand that this failure on his part to comply with the demand of a mere majority of the Senate in regard to an entirely immaterial matter shall be a justification and excuse to them for failing and refusing to concur with him in the appointment of suitable persons to office, and even for a vote of censure upon him and his Cabinet officers for not submitting to the judgment of the Senate as to the importance and contents of a private letter which they have never seen, and as to the contents of which they do not claim to have any knowledge.

But if we admit that the President of the United States has by the Constitution the power to remove an officer, the Senator from New York says the power to suspend comes from the statute. Where in the Constitution of the United States is there any power to pass a law which shall deprive the executive department of an executive power? The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], in one of the ablest arguments ever delivered in this Chamber, and which will carry his name down to posterity with eminence and credit, proved to demonstration by an argument that can not be met, that is perfect in its parts, that the powers of the two Houses are legislative entirely, that they have no executive power except that which the Constitution in express terms has conferred upon the Senate.

The power of removal is essentially a part of the execution of the laws. It can not be and is not pretended to be a legislative power. The power of suspension is equally a power essential to the execution of the laws and does not concern the performance of legislative duties. Unless there be an express grant of power in the Constitution to the Congress of the United States to provide for the suspension or the removal of officers they can not have it, and if there was such a power it would not belong to the Senate of the United States, it would belong to the two Houses of Congress. Therefore he who admits that the power of removal is granted by the Constitution to the President of the United States has no ground of argument to stand upon when he denies that the power of suspension is in like manner granted by the Constitution as an executive power.

In every point of view these resolutions are without authority of reason or argument or law. The history of the tenure-of-office act has been considered at large here. I do not propose to enter into it. Its censure by the great leader of the Republican party, Mr. Blaine, for so many years its Speaker and leader in the House of Representatives, so many years its candidate for the Presidency, its condemnation by many of the leading lights of the party on the ground of expediency, its condemnation by Webster, and the acquiescence in the power by Clay and by Calhoun as a fixed and settled interpretation of the Constitution, settled by the affirmation of the people in its submission to them time and again for a period of seventy years—the exposition of these facts by the Senator from New York in his admirable argument which I have here on the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, leaves that question without a ground of doubt or argument. It is true the Senator from Vermont still holds on to his cherished theory, but the experience of seventy years of this Government, the acquiescence of seventy years, the opinions of all these leading men have demonstrated the constitutional fact and established it as a part of the powers of the Presidential office.

In the colloquy which occurred yesterday evening it was stated that the President of the United States had proposed to the Senate of the United States that they should concur with him in the suspension of an officer, and then the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts undertook to say that therefore it was proper for the Senate to concur with him or refuse to concur and to have the reasons and the evidences upon which he asked for that concurrence. But the argument is too plain. It is not within the proper subject of consideration, although everything that is propounded from a Senator in this great body is supposed to be worthy of argument and consideration.

The idea that a message of the President of the United States can require this body to concur in the performance of an act and function of power which the Constitution has not authorized them to do, but has given it to the President—the idea that those who believe the power of removal is in the President alone by the Constitution of the United States can justify any action by the Senate in regard to a suspension because the President of the United States has acted under a law and proposed to them to do it when the law by their own testimony and admission is of no force and effect when the higher obligation of the Constitution rests upon them, when the judgment of the Senate in the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, when their own party with over a two-thirds majority here has affirmed that fact—the idea that a majority now, in the face even of those troublous times, of the acquittal of Mr. Johnson upon the express and specific ground that as an independent, co-ordinate department of this Government he had the right of judgment in regard to the constitutionality of his action in disobeying the tenure-of-office law—the idea of a majority now, upon the insignificant pretense that a paper the contents of which are unknown, and which the President of the United States says has no importance and no significance to the public service, can be made in the face not only of seventy years of practice, not only in the face of the testimony of Daniel Webster, of the acquiescence of Clay and Calhoun, of repeated popular declarations sanctioning the action of Andrew Jackson, but also supplemented by this great historical transaction, the impeachment and acquittal of Andrew Johnson on that express ground, that it can be made now by a majority of the Senate a ground of censure of the President of the United States because he has exercised his personal judgment, his constitutional judgment, as an independent co-ordinate department of this Government in regard to a private paper sent to him by a private citizen, and the possession of which can not in any wise whatever properly affect the performance of any official act by the Senate, whether the tenure-of-office act be constitutional or unconstitutional, expedient or inexpedient! If the papers called for were here, whether true or false, they would count no more than the unsworn statements of a private individual in regard to another private citizen.

It seems to me that this is small business for the Senate to be engaged in. Suppose we should admit all that is claimed, and we should admit that these letters, these papers, do slander the removed or suspended officers—suppose the fact is admitted here—what has that to do with the question before the Senate of the fitness or the unfitness of Mr. Burnett? And yet it is to obtain this testimony that these two weeks have been expended, it is to obtain testimony in the shape of an unsworn letter or statement, a calumny, if you please, in regard to this officer to afford him before the Senate an opportunity of vindicating himself! How? Not by a trial before this body and in the presence of the country, but by a pretended inquisition by some committee and a discussion in secret session of the fact whether this man stated what was true or what was false.

Suppose we admit that the object is to determine the consistency of the President of the United States in regard to his letters, either before or after his election; what concern has the Senate with that? It is evident that these are pretenses and unworthy pretenses that they have no ground upon which to stand in this body.

I shall not delay the Senate nor detain it for any length of time, but it seems to me that this is a very dangerous subject for this body. We do not represent the people of the United States; we are not elected by them—the President of the United States is. This is a day of popular movement, of popular feeling; a day of the people's power. We see already—it has been alluded to in this debate—how the organizations of the laboring people are striking at the very wheels and motive power of commerce and of trade. I sympathize with them. I see great good to come out of their action. I welcome the organization of labor. I believe that it is consistent with the protection of the highest interests of this people, and I am not unfriendly to it. I believe they will be controlled by a conservative and a wise spirit. It is the coming of a new power, the advent of an industrial age, the coming of greater power of the people into all and over all the departments of the Government.

I trust the Senate may be preserved with the duration of this Government and for all time to come, but it will never be preserved by assuming, upon false pretenses, to be the guardians of the people against the people themselves. It will never be preserved by defying the executive head, elected by the people and responsible to them. It is a dangerous attempt, in order to get a letter said to be slanderous and libelous in regard to an officer whose term of service has expired, to stop the constitutional performance of the duties of this body, to spend from two to three weeks in the discussion of the subject whether that unimportant letter, worthless if had, significant of no purpose, not even useful for the vindication of the private character of the applicant for office proposed by the President or the one suspended or removed, significant for no purpose and to no end and utterly worthless if produced here.

For these reasons, sir, I hope and trust that enough will be found in this body who will give their votes against the passage of a resolution virtually an impeachment, a declaration that this body would if they had the power impeach and ought to impeach the President of the United States, not because of some act performed, but because in its judgment an independent and co-ordinate department of the Government he has directed the officers at the head of the several Departments not to withhold information important to Congress or to the Senate, not to withhold public documents, not to deny access to individual Senators to these letters and papers, but that private correspondence of a slanderous character, calculated to create trouble between man and man, unsworn to, to which he has not given but has refused to give the impress of his official character and official decision—because in the exercise of his private judgment as the great executive head of this Government he has seen fit to say, "These papers are mine; I have not predicated official action upon them; I do not conceive it to be my duty to present them to the Senate;" and that is the whole case.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a motion to go into executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before that motion is put, if I may interrupt my friend, I wish to say that I shall ask and insist until a majority of the Senate votes the other way, that this matter shall be disposed of tomorrow.

Mr. INGALLS. I yield, retaining the floor, to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

REJECTED.

Nomination rejected by the Senate March 25, 1886.

John F. McBlain, nominated to be first lieutenant in the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry, United States Army.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

ORDNANCE SHOPS, WASHINGTON NAVY-YARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a statement showing certain expenditures in ordnance shop in the Washington navy-yard from March 1, 1882, to February 28, 1885; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE, GRAND ISLAND, MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Light-House Board of an appropriation for a light-house on Grand Island, in lieu of one on Saint Joseph Island, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

CAPE ORFORD LIGHT STATION, OREGON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Light-House Board amendatory of a former estimate for the next fiscal year for Cape Orford light station, Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BEACH, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for this day, on account of sickness in his family.

WHARTON'S INTERNATIONAL DECISIONS.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be purchased, for distribution among the members of the House of Representatives, 2,000 copies of a Digest of International Decisions of the United States edited by Francis Wharton; for distribution among the members of the Senate, 1,000; for the use of the Department of State, 1,000 copies, in all, 4,000 copies; said Digest to be paid for at a uniform price per volume, to be fixed by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations jointly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the presentation of the resolution?

Mr. RANDALL. Is the resolution offered merely for reference?

The SPEAKER. It is.

There was no objection, and the resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing.

SALE OF PROPERTY IN CHICAGO.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for present consideration a bill (S. 1394) to provide for the ascertainment of the market value of certain property in the city of Chicago, and to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and convey such property.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WORTHINGTON] asks unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from further consideration of the bill indicated by him and that it be now considered. The bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very much disinclined to object to the consideration of a bill which has been reported favorably by a committee of this House; but this bill proposes to sell property belonging to the Government, and, inasmuch as we have not been able to understand the measure fully from the mere reading, I submit that the gentleman from Illinois should not press his request at this time. I prefer that the matter should go over.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. There are very great interests which will be delayed and hindered if this bill be not acted on promptly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we should have an opportunity of examining this measure carefully. Our experience in matters of this kind has been very unfortunate.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. A bill passed at the last session provided for the erection of this public building. This measure simply turns back into the Treasury the unexpended appropriation and provides that the proceeds of the sale of ground now owned by the Government may be used for the erection of this building.

Mr. HOLMAN. But we must buy other property, as my friend knows; and I think we ought to consider this matter more deliberately.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, the bill is not before the House.

EXPENDITURES FOR INDIANS AND YELLOWSTONE PARK.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Printing.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the accompanying resolution, providing for the printing of 3,000 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Expenditures for the Indians and Yellowstone Park, having duly considered the same, report it back to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The estimated cost of printing is $472.20.

"Resolved, That there be printed 3,000 additional copies of the report of the Select Committee on Expenditures for the Indians and Yellowstone Park; 2,500 copies to be for the use of the House and 500 copies to be for the use of the committee."

The resolution reported by the committee was adopted.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS ALLOWED BY TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCOTT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit to the House of Representatives a list of all claims allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury enumerated in the House Executive Documents Nos. 55 and 153, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, for which appropriations have not been made.

Mr. SCOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS, ETC.

Mr. DIBBLE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, April 17, 1886, after the morning hour for consideration of bills reported from committees, be fixed for the consideration of such bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds as involve no expenditure from the Treasury, or an expenditure not exceeding $25,000 in any one bill; not to interfere with prior special orders or general revenue or appropriation bills, but if displaced by such, then to continue a special order for each Saturday thereafter until consideration of such bills be had.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. The last clause of the resolution would seem to give this committee the right to occupy Saturdays with their business during all the rest of the session after the date fixed.

Mr. DIBBLE. The provision of the resolution is simply that if our business be displaced on the Saturday designated we shall be entitled to occupy a subsequent Saturday until consideration is had.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the committee is only to have one day, as I understand.

Mr. DIBBLE. Only one day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, I want the gentleman from South Carolina to state what class of bills it is proposed to consider.

Mr. DIBBLE. Cases of partition of Government property, cases involving no money but which it is to the advantage of the Government to have considered; and in addition to those small bills involving appropriations of perhaps $10,000, $15,000, or $20,000, necessary to finish buildings now waiting for the money.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. And the order affects only a part of one day?

Mr. DIBBLE. Only one day.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

Mr. DIBBLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent to call up from the House Calendar for present consideration House bill No. 6394.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I call for the regular order. I think it best we should proceed with the public business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports for reference to the appropriate calendars.

GEORGE S. STORRS.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (S. 831) for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS AT VICKSBURG, MISS.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6764) to provide for holding terms of the United States courts at Vicksburg, Miss.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS, BAY CITY, MICH.

Mr. ROGERS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, also reported, as a substitute for H. R. 1221 and 2969, a bill (H. R. 7215) to provide for holding terms of the circuit and district courts of the United States for the eastern district of Michigan at Bay City, in said district, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bills Nos. 1221 and 2969 were ordered to be laid on the table.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask unanimous consent that the minority have permission to file its views, to accompany the report of the committee on this bill.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

FEES OF CLERKS, UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. EZRA B. TAYLOR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3593) to repeal section 840 and to amend section 839 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES COURTS, NEBRASKA.

Mr. CASWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 5005, a bill (H. R. 7216) to provide for holding terms of the United States district and circuit courts in the district of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 5005 was ordered to be laid on the table.

IRRIGATION, COLORADO DESERT.

Mr. VAN EATON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3219) to promote the introduction of fresh water on the Colorado desert; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

TERRITORY OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. HILL, from the Committee on the Territories, reported a bill (H. R. 7217) to provide for the organization of the Territory of Oklahoma, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on the Territories.

COLUMBIA COUNTY, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

Mr. COOPER, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 6965) to authorize Columbia County, in Washington Territory, to issue bonds for the construction of a court-house; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT CHATTANOOGA.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 2347, a bill (H. R. 7218) to amend an act entitled "An act for the erection of a public building at Chattanooga, Tenn.," approved February 25, 1885; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 2347 was ordered to be laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WORCESTER, MASS.

Mr. WILKINS, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with favorable recommendation the bill (S. 230) for the erection of a public building at Worcester, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. B. DAWSON.

Mr. BUCHANAN, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 5326) for the relief of E. B. Dawson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRYAN TYSON.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 3239) for the relief of Bryan Tyson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. B. THOMPSON.

Mr. NEAL, from the Committee on Claims, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 570) for the relief of E. B. Thompson; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. HIESTAND, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 2088) for the relief of Andrew Shoenfelt; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ANNUAL REPORT BUREAU OF ETHNOLOGY.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Printing, reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 120) to print the annual bulletin of the Bureau of Ethnology; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Printing, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the joint resolution (H. Res. 130) to distribute copies of special memoirs and reports of the Geological Survey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PURCHASE OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS, ETC.

Mr. DUNN, from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3159 and 5207, a bill (H. R. 7219) to amend sections 4132 and 2513 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to authorize the purchase of foreign-built ships by citizens of the United States and to permit the same to be registered as vessels of the United States, and to admit certain materials to be used in the construction of vessels free of duty; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent on behalf of the minority of the committee to present their views and to have them printed with the report of the majority.

There was no objection.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SCRANTON, PA.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4241) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the purchase of a site and the erection of a suitable building for a post-office and other Government offices in the city of Scranton, Pa.," approved July 27, 1882; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM F. DUNLOP.

Mr. COLLINS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with amendments the joint resolution (H. Res. 79) for the relief of William F. Dunlop, trustee; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the amendments and accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of standing and select committees. The hour for the consideration of bills commences at one minute before 1 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Printing.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE IN GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office, and to request unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and to consider it in the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the employés of the Government Printing Office be allowed a leave of absence, with pay, not exceeding fifteen days in any one year, at such time as the Public Printer may designate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that the same be considered in the House?

Mr. STORM. I will object unless the report is read or some explanation is given.

The SPEAKER. The reading of the report would be in the nature of debate.

Mr. STORM. Then I object.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. HATCH in the chair), for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BARKSDALE. This bill is founded on a motive to deal justly and impartially by the employés of the Government. For probably half a century the Department clerks have enjoyed the privilege which is proposed to be secured to the beneficiaries of this bill, with this difference, however, that the Department clerks are allowed thirty days' leave of absence with pay, while this bill proposes to allow but fifteen days' leave of absence, with pay, to the employés of the Government Printing Office.

The Forty-eighth Congress, I will remark, Mr. Chairman, passed a bill extending to letter-carriers the benefits of the allowance which is proposed by this measure. The employés of the Government Printing Office, whose services are indispensable to the Government, whose work is as faithful, and who toil more hours in the day than any other employés of the Government, are alone the excepted class. The bill will place them measurably, though not wholly, upon an equality of privilege with other employés of the Government.

Now, sir, without taking up further time of the committee in explanation of the objects of this bill, I will send to the Clerk's desk the report of the very efficient and competent Public Printer, and ask him to read what relates to this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

I desire again to renew my recommendation for fifteen days' leave of absence annually for the employés of the Government Printing Office. In speaking upon this subject in previous reports, I said:

"In view of the fact that the clerks in the various Departments, working a less number of hours per day, are entitled to thirty days' leave of absence each year, I submit that as a matter of right and justice to the employés of the Government Printing Office, who have ever been faithful day and night, it would seem proper that at least to some extent the law should be so modified that they too can be favored with a leave of absence. A more faithful and devoted class of employés can not be found in any Department; and I respectfully call the attention of Congress to this question, and express the hope that some provision may be made for them in the direction indicated."

A bill making a specific appropriation for this purpose (as was done in the case of the letter-carriers of the Post-Office Department) would be an act of justice to those who work more hours for less pay than any other class of Government employés. When unfortunately stricken down by sickness their pay at once ceases, while in almost every other branch of the Government under such circumstances employés continue to draw their pay. The prompt, efficient, and faithful work of this office advances legislation in a very gratifying degree; and those who, during the session, work extra hours, at the risk of health, and sacrifice of hours that belong to home duties, should receive some recognition that will at least be a step in the direction of justice as between the different classes of Government employés.

Believing that such a deserved and just law would be recognized by a still more efficient service, and, above all, on account of the equity in the request, I earnestly recommend that a special appropriation of $90,000 be made for the purpose of granting the employés of this office fifteen days' leave with pay. This recommendation is made in lieu of any proposed legislation for leave on account of sickness, as it is believed that furloughs granted on that account might result in much abuse of the privilege. Under all the circumstances, in my judgment, fifteen days' annual leave will be more satisfactory. This will be but one-half the time allowed in the various Executive Departments, and I hope this recommendation, so often urged, will be regarded as reasonable, and result in favorable action.

Mr. STORM and Mr. TAULBEE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] yielded the floor?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. TAULBEE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to the end of the bill the following proviso:

"Provided, That no employé shall be entitled to the benefits of this bill who has not served as such employé for a period of six months next preceding the application for such leave of absence."

Mr. TAULBEE. I hope this amendment will be agreed to, because it will obviate the trouble which may arise in the operation of this bill.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Will the gentlemen permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I wish merely to state that the committee has formulated an amendment covering the very ground this amendment covers, and it will be offered as soon as opportunity is presented.

Mr. TAULBEE. I have no ambition to gratify in offering amendments. But after the gentleman had presented the bill, offered his argument in its favor, and yielded the floor, I could not arrive at any other conclusion than that he proposed to submit the bill as it then stood.

I am perfectly willing, providing the amendment to be offered by the committee covers the particulars intended to be covered by my amendment, to withdraw mine. I, however, will not withdraw it until I have an opportunity to ascertain what is contained in the amendment proposed by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] that his amendment was read by unanimous consent merely for the information of the House. Amendments are not in order until general debate upon the bill has been closed.

Mr. TAULBEE. But, Mr. Chairman, I understood that general debate was closed, from the fact that the gentleman in charge of the bill had surrendered the floor and there was no one else attempting to be recognized.

Mr. STORM. I had risen, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] for the purpose of debating the bill, if he so desired, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM] also rose at the same time. The gentleman from Kentucky is now recognized for debate if he so desires.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, if in submitting the few remarks which I have to submit upon this bill it is to be considered that I am in the attitude of opposing the bill, I wish now, for the purposes of debate, to assume the position. I can not say that I am opposed to some such bill as this, properly guarded against abuses. I know it is a generally conceded proposition that the men in charge of the patronage of the Government are presumed to be honest, and that every man charged with the high responsibility of a public position in the Government Departments will use his best endeavor to bring about such a state of the public service as will command the respect of the country. I say this is a general, and it seems to be a reasonable, conclusion, but if we were left to arrive at such a conclusion by our own observation, it would require on the part of the average member of Congress only about one month's experience with these public Departments to ascertain that they are full of abuses, and therefore I am opposed to passing any bill here in relation to administration in the Departments unless it be so hedged about by safeguards as to preclude the possibility of abuses of the public service, I care not who may have charge of the administration of that service.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, it is my duty to guard the interests of the Treasury. I believe that it is my duty as a Representative on this floor to with my vote and my voice do everything in my power to protect the rights of the people who are compelled to pay the taxes that support the public service of this country. In view of that fact, Mr. Chairman, more than two weeks ago I introduced a resolution looking to the correction of certain abuses in the public service. That resolution was overlooked for two weeks by the committee to which it was referred, and was reported back yesterday with such amendments as may possibly destroy its efficiency; but it is to be hoped, at least by the more sanguine, that the resolution, even as amended by the committee, may effect the object for which it was intended.

Mr. Chairman, the existence of the facts which led to the introduction of that resolution is not generally known to the public. The abuses which have existed in the public service of this country for a number of years have been kept hidden from the public, and it was to be hoped, Mr. Chairman, that when the people elected a Democratic administration those abuses would have been promptly and effectually corrected.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield for a question?

Mr. TAULBEE. Certainly.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Will the gentleman please state to the committee what abuse he thinks would arise under this bill?

Mr. TAULBEE. The abuses, Mr. Chairman, which I imagine could arise under this bill, under practices not less corrupt than those indulged in by other branches of the public service, would take this form: Under this bill appointees might receive leave of absence with pay without having served more than one day.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. TAULBEE. I am not through, if the gentleman pleases; I wish to answer his question fully. The abuse would be that an employé after serving perhaps one day might receive leave of absence with pay, and then, after serving a day after his return, might be dismissed; then his successor, after serving one day, might become the beneficiary of this bill and might serve another day at the end and might then be dismissed, and so on.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But I understand from the chairman of the committee that reported this bill that they have an amendment expressly designed to prevent that abuse.

Mr. TAULBEE. I understand that, and I think the chairman and the members of the committee understand my position in the matter.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment proposed by the committee read. It covers the point which the gentleman from Kentucky has in view.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let it be read for information.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TAULBEE. I will yield to one at a time. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman who has just addressed me—I believe he is a member of the committee—I wish to say that I am willing to have the amendment proposed by the committee read in my time. Now I yield for a question.

Mr. BARKSDALE. If the amendment of the committee covers the entire ground desired by the gentleman will he support the bill?

Mr. TAULBEE. That depends, Mr. Chairman, upon some facts which may be developed from the cross-examination of the gentleman in charge of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKSDALE. Very well; then I will expect your support.

Mr. TAULBEE. You can have my support on the grounds I have indicated. My support will depend upon facts which I hope to develop by an examination of the gentleman in charge of the bill.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Printing was read, as follows:

After the word "year," in line 5, insert the words "after the service of one year, and under such regulations and;" so that if amended the bill will read as follows:

"That the employés of the Government Printing Office be allowed a leave of absence with pay, not exceeding fifteen days in any one year, after the service of one year, and under such regulations and at such time as the Public Printer may designate."

Mr. FARQUHAR. Now, will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me for a brief statement?

Mr. TAULBEE. I yield for the gentleman's statement.

Mr. FARQUHAR. The gentleman will see that while he claims that the term of service should be six months in order to entitle an employé to this leave of absence, the amendment proposed by the Committee on Printing makes the time of service one year. That was done to make it conform to the rule in other cases. For instance, the letter-carriers are allowed the same leave of absence and so are the employés in other Departments. The purpose is simply to make the rule uniform. The committtee do not doubt that six months' service would be perhaps sufficient to entitle an employé to a leave of absence, but for the sake of conforming to the general rule in the other Departments we propose to make the term one year. That is the unanimous judgment of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. TAULBEE. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the amendment offered by the gentleman who represents the committee will work hardship on the employés of this department. It may not suit the convenience of the public service to grant these leaves of absence in a particular season of the year; for instance during the session of Congress. But if an appointment is made about the time of the convening of Congress, the first Monday in December, such an appointee, under the amendment proposed, must serve one year before he can receive the benefits of this bill. His one year's service will thus expire about the time Congress reconvenes and then it may not be possible to dispense with his services. Thus, under the amendment, the service of an appointee may be continued fifteen or eighteen months before he can receive any benefit from this bill.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. I would like to ask my colleague a question. Judging by his experience since he has been a member of Congress, will he tell the House how many appointments he thinks are likely to be made during any one session of Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. TAULBEE. So far as my experience goes, I do not think it has been sufficiently extensive in the matter of securing appointments to entitle my opinion to any weight with this House. [Laughter.] I am glad, however, to know that my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. STONE] has been a little more fortunate in that particular than I have.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while this amendment covers the point intended to be covered by the amendment which I offered, I believe that if employés in the Government Printing Office are entitled to the leave of absence contemplated by the bill, they ought to be entitled to it after having served a period of six months. The gentlemen, however, in charge of this bill seem to have undertaken to afford the relief which their knowledge of the business of the Government Printing Office would indicate as needful. I shall not, therefore, antagonize the amendment offered by the committee, nor shall I insist on the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk. I am willing that every employé in the public service shall be treated with fairness. I am unwilling that from any consideration, either personal or political, the honest employés of this Government shall be in any manner oppressed. But for reasons which I believe to be right, because I represent a constituency which aids in the payment of the public taxes of this country, I shall at all times insist upon dispensing with such appointees, such service, and such salaries as are conceded to be unnecessary for the proper execution of public business.

I shall also insist as a Representative, knowing that it is my right to do so, that all abuses practiced in the public service shall be speedily corrected. In other words, I can not, for the sake of appearing to support an administration to which the country looks for so great blessings, wink at or tolerate by my silence the practice which has for a number of years prevailed in our public service of selling offices as matter of merchandise. Nor can I, in duty to myself and the oath which I have taken, be silent when persons whose services are not necessary to carry on the business of the Government are retained upon the pay-rolls as a matter of political or personal favoritism. These abuses, Mr. Chairman, do exist; and the country is to be congratulated that the present administration has in some measure corrected these abuses; and the verbal assurance is given (be that worth what it may) that, as speedily as can be done consistently with the interests of the public service, the abuses still existing shall be wiped out.

In view of these considerations I regard it as our duty to guard carefully any provisions of law introduced into this House granting privileges to employés in the public service. I believe that if the employés of the Government Printing Office are carried on the rolls in the same manner as are employés in the other Departments they are entitled to as much leave of absence during the year as the employés in the Treasury Department or the Interior or the Post-Office or any other Department of the Government. I am glad that the committee have reported such a bill as this. I am glad that they are awake to the interests of these honest employés, for I presume they are honest, as I know nothing to the contrary. I am ready and willing to vote on the bill as proposed to be amended.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] as to the abuses creeping into the Government offices, I wish to say that instead of the measure now proposed being liable to lead to abuse, we seek to relieve the employés of the Government Printing Office from an evident injustice and oppression. In that office there are employed about eight hundred females and fifteen hundred males. The work which these employés perform is more onerous, the time occupied is longer, the pay is smaller than in other departments of the Government where the employés are allowed a leave of absence of thirty days with pay. This bill, as we propose to amend it, provides simply that persons employed for one year in the Government Printing Office may, under such regulations as the Public Printer shall prescribe, be entitled to a leave of absence of fifteen days with pay. This proposition being the first that has been introduced in Congress for the relief of this class of people who work for wages, and carrying on its face so much evident justice and right, we had hoped the bill would be passed without further debate. I trust that by unanimous consent the general debate may terminate, that the amendment may be adopted, and the bill passed.

Mr. STORM. I wish to inquire whether persons employed in other Departments of the Government as laborers have any leave of absence.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I do not know how it is with respect to laborers; that is the point we want to get at. The clerks receiving high salaries and doing light labor are allowed leaves of absence, while these persons in the Government Printing Office who do the hardest labor, who bear the brunt and burden of the work, have no leave of absence on pay at all.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I would like to answer the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM]. I desire to say that all these employés in the different Departments are laborers, some laboring with the pen, others laboring in other ways; so that the principle is precisely the same.

Mr. STORM. I merely asked the question for information.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for one moment?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will suggest the propriety to the gentleman from Mississippi of so amending the bill as to make it a little more definite as to whom it embraces.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I am unable to hear the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee because of the confusion in the Hall.

Mr. MCMILLIN. What I was suggesting was more explicitness in the bill. This is a proposition to place the employés of the Government Printing Office upon the same footing that employés in the other Departments of the Government stand upon. But it will be remembered that they are not employed in the same way, and therefore there ought to be some provision in the bill clearly showing to whom it applies that it may be administered properly.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. There is already a provision in the bill that covers that very point.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In my opinion it does not cover it.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes; that is provided for in that clause of the bill which requires these leaves shall be granted under such regulations as the Public Printer may prescribe. If it is piece-work, for example, as it is called in printers' phraseology, and the average pay of the employé is $100 a month he would be allowed $50 for a leave of absence for two weeks.

Mr. MCMILLIN. While I sympathize with the object of the bill of placing the employés of the Government Printing Office on as favorable a footing as those occupy in the other Departments of the Government, I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that his bill is insufficient. It is crude in this respect: A large number of the force is employed on what is known as piece-work. They may work if they can get the work to do, or they may stay away, or have to sit in idleness and "wait for something to turn up." They may work half an hour to-day, or five hours to-morrow, or the whole day, as the Government's necessities may demand. They may work a week, a month, or six months, if the Government has employment for them. They are under no obligation to continue in the service except when there is work to be done.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Let me ask the gentleman from Tennessee in what Department this is done; where is it a man is allowed to go when he pleases?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I did not intend to say exactly that, but that some of the work in the Printing Office is temporary and uncertain in its nature, not furnishing regular annual employment. Such an employé on piece-work does not stand on the same footing as a man does who is employed by the year in any one of the Departments, because among other things you can not regulate or calculate the time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Of course not.

Mr. MCMILLIN. He is employed by the piece. Some days he will be kept busy; other days he will have nothing to do. He sits at his desk when unemployed, or goes out into the city as may be his inclination or the permission of the office. His work is not annual or regular.

Now, I can not see how you are going to do justice by the Government and by the employés of the Government with the state of facts facing you by the bill before us without amendment.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Allow me to explain to the gentleman.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. FARQUHAR. These men are borne on the rolls, whether on piece-work, on the RECORD, or any other regular work. They are not subject to their own discharge. They are borne on the rolls. When there is continuous piece-work, the men may work nine months or six months or four months or whatever time it may be. And these are employés such as are described and provided for in this bill, and this bonus or benefit to these employés is placed in conformity to and in accordance with the same rules provided for the other employés of the Government; that is, under such rules and regulations and at such time as will comport with the needs of the public service, such as the Public Printer may designate. If the employé faithfully does his duty and is borne on the roll for one year on piece-work or on regular work, it is provided he shall have this leave of absence.

Mr. MCMILLIN. It may be that for the six months they are borne upon the rolls there will be nothing for them to do.

Mr. FARQUHAR. There is nothing in fact of that character in the Government Printing Office.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Yes, there is.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Then the gentleman must mean substitutes.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That class I am speaking of go there and do whatever work may be given to them as piece-work. It may not amount to half an hour a day, or it may amount to the whole day. You propose to give the same leave of absence to those employés as to those who work nine hours a day continuously.

Mr. FARQUHAR. No; we do not.

Mr. McMILLIN. Where is the provision which prevents it?

Mr. FARQUHAR. In this expression, if the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, "after a service for one year."

Mr. McMILLIN. "After a service for one year." What sort of service? Those who are paid by the piece get their pay because they are borne on the roll in some capacity. There is no question about that. And a roll is made out for this class of employés just as it is for those who stand there and feed the machines for eight hours a day.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. McMILLIN. With pleasure.

Mr. SOWDEN. I merely wish to ask if the gentleman does not know that there are no employés doing work as compositors in the printing department that are borne on the annual rolls or employed by the year? Are they not all employed to do this work by the day?

Mr. McMILLIN. That is true with most of them, and is the very point I am trying to get at. It is that information which I regard as essential to a proper understanding of this bill. Now, this bill, we are told, pretends to do a measure of justice to this class of employés, the same measure that is done to the other classes of employés under the Government; but there is a class of employés in the Government Printing Office to which I have referred who do not stand on the same footing with the others. How are we to reach them? That is the question. Take, for instance, the workers on the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They have nothing to work on except for six months of the year. They can not have a year's continuous work.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. Let me interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee to say that the bill does not provide that they shall have this leave only because they are borne on the rolls. It provides that those who have served for a period of one year, who have worked for a year, for that is the meaning of the word "served," shall have this leave of absence; and not because their names are borne on the rolls.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit a suggestion?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Suppose some of these employés are paid by the piece and not paid annually, but are paid for what they do; how would you know how to pay them for the time they are furloughed in case a furlough shall be granted to them?

Mr. McMILLIN. That is the very question I am trying to have answered by the author of the bill or you of the committee reporting it. You are the men making the report and you do not give me information upon this point. That is what I want to find out, information that we ought to have.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I do not think the provisions of the bill apply to those who are doing this class of work.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then we understand what the committee intend.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. If the gentleman will make a suggestion that will cover that particular branch of the case it will be very satisfactory.

Mr. McMILLIN. I agree with my friend from North Carolina that something of the kind he suggests would make the bill more definite. I stated that the bill ought to be more explicit in its provisions. Now if we can get it to a plane where we can legislate properly upon this subject and do justice to all alike we ought to do it; but we certainly ought not to be expected to act until we know precisely what we are doing. As it is now, we are, I fear, left in too much uncertainty as to the effect of the bill.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But the gentleman from Tennessee forgets that the business of that office is so complicated that if the House would undertake hastily to prescribe a rule of action for the guidance of the office it would be liable to fall into some serious error.

Mr. McMILLIN. And for that very reason the House ought to proceed very deliberately and not in a groping or pell-mell way.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But the House is proceeding deliberately, just as the committee did in framing the bill. In the very nature of things such matters as the gentleman from Tennessee refers to must be left to the discretion of the Public Printer. It is a subject that can not be legislated upon in all of its details. It is not for the House, therefore, to determine what discretion the Public Printer shall exercise in this particular matter, but he must be guided by his own discretion just as is the case with the other heads of Departments.

Mr. McMILLIN. If we can not devise a proper method of arranging the matter, how do we know the Public Printer can?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Exactly as in the case of all the other Departments.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me a moment?

Mr. McMILLIN. Certainly.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I wish to state to the gentleman that the piece-work employés to whom he refers are regular employés of the office. They are not paid by the month stipulated salaries, but by the work done; and the Public Printer takes the piece-work employés and ascertains what his averages are by the month and bases his estimates upon that.

There is nothing crude or imperfect in the bill. It has been carefully considered by the committee, and I contend it is perfectly fair and easily understood by any man acquainted with the details of the office.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Mississippi says that the provisions of this bill with reference to this class of employés can be readily understood. Now, I ask the gentleman, what number of days, under the provisions of this bill, leave of absence would be granted to the piece-work men.

Mr. BARKSDALE. As the bill provides, fifteen. And the piece-work employés, I will say to the gentleman, are as regular as any other employés in the department.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. But they do not get any leave unless they have served a year.

Mr. BARKSDALE. They are paid by the piece, but they must have worked a year before they are entitled to the leave.

Mr. McMILLIN. They sometimes have to wait two week before they get anything to do.

Mr. BARKSDALE. But if they are not doing anything they are not paid.

Mr. McMILLIN. But you say by this bill that they are to get fifteen days' leave of absence, no matter what the terms are. As they are paid by the piece, how much money will you pay for their days of absence? Now, I am willing that the bill shall pass granting to these employés such relief as will place them upon the footing of other employés of the Government. If the House thinks this is a proper bill to pass, let it be done. I am ready to do justice; but I fear we are not doing it very intelligibly. It looks to me like we are passing a bill the provisions of which do not seem to have been overcarefully matured.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McMILLIN. Just a word further. I wish to state that I am in favor of giving these employés, when it can be done on the same footing with the other employés, their fifteen days' leave of absence; but I do not see how this bill accomplishes the object, especially when I remember that the Government Printing Office is on an entirely different footing from the other Departments. Even under the system known as "civil-service reform" system, that has delighted so many people's heads and the hearts of so few, it is not now on the same footing as the others—not being subject to that law.

Mr. MATSON. I had the honor to introduce the bill under consideration. I apprehend the difficulty the committee now meets with. There were two kinds of employés: One who works by the time and the other by the piece. But I apprehend that the provisions of this bill, as proposed to be amended by the committee, providing this leave of absence shall be granted under such regulations as the Public Printer may prescribe, will fully meet that difficulty.

It may be impossible for my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] or myself to point out just exactly how the Public Printer will designate the time when these employés shall be given their leave of absence and as to how much pay shall be designated to each one; but with a competent head of that office there can be no difficulty about doing justice to these employés upon the basis of giving them fifteen days' leave with pay. I apprehend under the bill he will take into consideration that clause which provides they shall have served one year; and if during the previous year any employé has been idle for six months, that will be a matter within his discretion. At the head of the greatest business institution in all our Government, he will take that into consideration, and designate the time as to how much leave the particular employé will have, if any. There is a discretion given in this matter to the Public Printer that meets this difficulty.

Now I believe the House wants to pass this bill. I believe the basis of it, the proposition to do justice to those who are peculiarly laborers in the service of the Governmont of the United States, is one that meets the approval of this House and one that it is ready to indorse.

Mr. STEELE. I should like to ask my colleague a question.

Mr. MATSON. I yield to my colleague for a question.

Mr. STEELE. The gentleman was speaking about a competent head of the Government Printing Office. I would like to know what are the prospects of this in the future?

Mr. MATSON. I do not know. I am interested now in the prospects of this bill. That is what interests me. I am interested in the employés of the office more than in the office of the Public Printer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] withdraws his amendment.

Mr. TAULBEE. I do, with the right to renew it if the other amendment is not adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment submitted to the committee.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "year," in line 5, insert the words "after a service of one year and under such regulations and;" so that it will read:

"That the employés of the Government Printing Office be allowed leave of absence with pay not exceeding fifteen days in any one year after a service of one year, and under such regulations and at such time as the Public Printer may designate."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. McADOO. Before that is done I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I would remind the gentleman that the time left of the hour is very short, and I am anxious to get a vote.

Mr. MCADOO. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "office," in line 3, insert the words "and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing."

Mr. BARKSDALE. I hope the gentleman will not encumber this bill with that amendment.

Mr. MCADOO. Is there a bill now pending which covers the object of my amendment? These employés are just as deserving as those of the Printing Office, and both are deserving of what is now accorded to more favored, if less industrious, employés. I do not want, however, to imperil this just measure nor interfere with the Labor Committee, which will undoubtedly take proper care of these deserving people in the bureau. I want all of these employés to get their vacation.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Missouri. There is a bill reported from the Committee on Labor covering that point. I earnestly hope there will be no obstruction to the passage of the bill now under consideration, which is extremely meritorious. This class of employés, equally with other Government employés, are deserving of this needed rest.

Mr. MCADOO. That is satisfactory to me.

Mr. LORE. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, and also that it is the substance of a bill now pending. I of course do not object to the employés of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing having any such leave of absence. On the contrary, I favor that proposition; but I object to the proposed amendment, because the effect of it, urged at this time, would be to kill this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi that the committee rise and report the bill as amended with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 544) granting leave of absence to employés in the Government Printing Office, had instructed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1851) establishing a commission to report to Congress on manuscripts belonging to the Government.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1556) for the relief of David W. Jones; and

A bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood.

DISTRIBUTION OF UNITED STATES OFFICIAL REGISTER.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to call up for consideration the joint resolution (H. Res. 89) providing for the distribution of the Official Register of the United States. And to save time I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the resolution and to consider the same in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution is before the House for consideration.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That inasmuch as the Official Register of the United States is now supplied to depositories of public documents as one of the set of Congressional documents in leather binding, so much of the act of December 15, 1877, as provides for supplying depositories with this document is hereby repealed; and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to send the Register to such library not a depository as shall be named to him for the purpose by each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress.

SEC. 2. That the Public Printer shall supply the leather-bound copies of this document for depositories as soon as practicable after its publication.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. REID, of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred House resolution 89, providing for the distribution of the Official Register of the United States, respectfully report:

The purpose of the resolution is to prevent supplying depositories of public documents with duplicate copies of the Official Register. No expenditure of money is involved.

Your committee recommend the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. I move the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Does this provide for an increased number?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. No, sir. Under existing law duplicate copies are sent to some, and this allows others to be designated by members.

Mr. MCMILLIN. There is no additional printing?

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. None at all.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPRINTING COMMITTEE REPORTS.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to ask that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of House resolution No. 73, and that the same be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The title of the resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 73) authorizing the printing of committee reports.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, let us hear the joint resolution read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the reports of committees, the evidence and papers submitted therewith, or any part thereof, printed by order of Congress may be reprinted at the Public Printing Office, at the instance of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, upon payment in advance to the Public Printer of the cost thereof with 10 per cent. added, the same as if originally printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. MCMILLIN. That is right.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. REID, of North Carolina) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the resolution (H. Res. 73) authorizing the printing of committee reports, have considered the same, and beg leave to report:

Under existing law any person desiring extra copies of any document printed at the Government Printing Office by authority of law can have the same printed at said office, if he shall notify the Public Printer previous to its being put to press, and shall pay to him, in advance, the estimated cost thereof, and 10 per cent. thereon. The resolution under consideration extends this privilege as to printing reports of committees, the evidence and papers submitted therewith, or any part thereof, to Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress upon the same terms, and allows the notice or order to be given for said printing at any time either before or after the matter is put to press. No appropriation of public money is required.

Your committee recommend the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the joint resolution be put upon its passage.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know whether this joint resolution would cover a request for the printing of an entire set of Medical and Surgical Reports?

The SPEAKER. This relates only to reports of committees.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. REID, of North Carolina, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON EUROPEAN DOCK-YARDS, ETC.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. Res. 58) with amendments authorizing the printing of a naval report.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed and bound in cloth, at the Government Printing Office, for distribution by the Navy Department, 3,000 copies of the report of Naval Constructor Philip Hichborn, United States Navy, on European dock-yards, details, fitting and equipment of foreign vessels, torpedo boats, ship-yard appliances, tools, &c., and that they be delivered to and distributed by the Secretary of the Navy for general information.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MCMILLIN. Let us hear the report read.

The report (by Mr. FARQUHAR) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred House resolution 58, providing for the printing of the report of Naval Constructor Philip Hichborn, United States Navy, on European dock-yards, &c., having duly considered the same, respectfully report the same back to the House with the following amendments, and recommend its passage:

(1) Strike out the words "for distribution by the Navy Department, three," and insert in their place the words "in addition to the 'usual number,' four."

(2) In lines 8 and 9 strike out the words "and that they" and insert the words "of which additional number 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House, 500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies,"—

The resolution as amended then to read:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there be printed and bound in cloth at the Government Printing Office, in addition to the "usual number," 4,000 copies of the report of Naval Constructor Philip Hichborn, U. S. N., on European dock-yards, details, fitting and equipment of foreign vessels, torpedo boats, ship-yard appliances, tools, &c., of which additional number 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the House, 500 copies for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies be delivered to and distributed by the Secretary of the Navy for general information."

The estimated cost of printing and binding the 4,000 copies is $5,004.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman in charge of the bill give some reason why this printing should be done? It appears that it is to cost $1.25 a volume, and the work is for general distribution and general information. The House is not instructed further than by the title of the resolution as to what its contents are or why it is necessary to have this printing done.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, I will briefly state that this report is the result of a visit of this naval constructor to Europe and of his investigation of the latest naval architecture there as to tools, instruments, woods, metals, everything in naval architecture. The report is unequivocally indorsed by the Navy Department and also by members of this House and Senators who have had the conduct of naval affairs in Congress in the last Congress and this.

Apart from this report, the latest authority on the subject of naval architecture is Chief Engineer King's report, which is now eight years old and in many particulars obsolete. The report which this resolution proposes to print is the very latest and, so far as the committee can find, the most complete report that has been made on modern naval architecture.

Mr. LONG. Have any copies of this report been printed?

Mr. FARQUHAR. None.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has the Navy Department called for the printing of this volume?

Mr. FARQUHAR. It has.

Mr. McMILLIN. For the reprinting?

Mr. FARQUHAR. The printing, not the reprinting.

Mr. McMILLIN. Of course the document would be printed by the Navy Department. But does that Department call for the printing of this additional number of copies for general distribution?

Mr. FARQUHAR. Let me explain to the gentleman. The Committee on Printing followed the resolution as introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. After consultation with Naval Constructor Hichborn and others as to the merits and usefulness of the report, the committee discussed the question of the cost of printing and the demand there would be for the report from the various committees of this House and from the public at large. This resolution as reported embodies the best judgment of the committee as to the number of copies and the manner of distribution.

Mr. McMILLIN. But this goes beyond what seems to be the purpose of the Navy Department—to have this document for the use of the Deparment and the various committees here. The resolution seeks to print, at $1.25 per volume, several thousand copies for general distribution. I desire to know whether the Navy Department has requested the printing of these volumes for general distribution, or from what source the request comes other than from the officer who made the report.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Allow me to say to the gentleman that originally the proposition was that the Navy Department should have nearly the whole of this distribution. The Committee on Printing, after consultation with the gentleman who framed this resolution, and also with Naval Constructor Hichborn, came to the conclusion that instead of allowing one Department of the Government to control the distribution of this report, which is of general interest to the whole country, especially those interested in ship-building, it would be proper to provide, as we propose in the amendment, that the House and the Senate should control something like one-half of the distribution, leaving to the Navy Department sufficient to meet its wants.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then the effect may possibly be the duplication of copies—the very thing we sought to guard against a moment ago. I am unable to see that we are going to derive any benefit from the publication of any greater number of this document than may be necessary for the use of the Navy Department and our committees.

Mr. FARQUHAR. But the gentleman will see by examining our amendments that we do not propose to increase the number; we have simply changed the distribution, so that the document may be beneficial to the House, the Senate, and the country, as well as to the Navy Department.

Mr. McMILLIN. The committee has not increased the number as proposed in the resolution; but the point I make is that the resolution proposes to print a number that the public exigency does not demand.

Mr. FARQUHAR. That is a matter for the consideration of the House.

The SPEAKER. The hour for the consideration of bills called up by committees has expired.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (S. 39) to authorize the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting a statue of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

GEORGE S. STORRS.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up for present consideration Senate bill No. 831, for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas. This is a bill for the removal of political disabilities, and was reported this morning from the Committee on the Judiciary. The bill has already been passed by the Senate, but owing to some of the papers having been mislaid, action in this House has been postponed for about six weeks.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the House proceeded to its consideration. It was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That George S. Storrs, of the State of Texas, be, and he is hereby, relieved of all political disabilities imposed upon him by the third section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed (two-thirds voting in favor thereof).

CONTESTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. TURNER, from the Committee on Elections, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6637) relating to contested elections; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to resume the consideration of the Post-Office appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union (Mr. HAMMOND in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman proceeds, the Chair desires to state that of the six hours to which the general debate on this bill was limited by order of the House one hour and thirty-eight minutes have been consumed, of which thirteen minutes have been occupied by gentlemen on the right, and one hour and twenty-five minutes by gentlemen on the left. There remains four hours and twenty-two minutes, of which two hours and forty-seven minutes will be assigned to gentlemen on the right, and one hour and thirty-five minutes to gentlemen on the left.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to ask a question as to the distribution of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the time divided accurately between the two sides of the House.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Chair will permit me to state that one of the gentlemen who is recognized as entitled to occupy an hour on this side, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER], a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, proposes to wholly indorse the bill as reported by that committee. By the division of time as announced by the Chair the hour to be occupied by that gentleman is charged against this side, on which, while there is a cordial support of almost every feature of the bill, there is, however, dissent as to two special paragraphs.

Mr. GUENTHER. I beg the gentleman's pardon, I am not going to "wholly indorse the bill."

The CHAIRMAN. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." When the gentleman from Wisconsin takes the floor, if he is not entitled to it, the Chair will then decide the question.

Mr. BURROWS. I understood the Chair to say that there had been occupied on this side one hour and twenty-five minutes, which time would be deducted from the time belonging to this side. I wish to remind the Chair that twenty minutes of that time was yielded to me from the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. That is true, and it should be charged to the gentlemen on the right.

Mr. BURROWS. Then we have really used on this side only an hour and five minutes.

Mr. BLOUNT. I understood from the gentleman from Missouri that he yielded the time with the understanding that it was to be made up from the time of some other gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter of private contract between members.

Mr. BURROWS. That is arranged satisfactorily between the gentleman from Missouri and myself.

Mr. BLOUNT. Then I see no trouble about it.

Mr. BURROWS. I merely wanted it understood that on this side we had used only one hour and twenty-five minutes.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to discuss the items in this bill making appropriation for the expenses of the foreign mail service for the ensuing fiscal year, I desire to give a concise statement of the legislative history of this important branch of the Post-Office Department.

Postmaster-General Howe, in a letter to the Senate of date February 12, 1863, reviews briefly its history prior to the year 1848, in the following language:

Previous to the mail steamship contracts authorized by the acts of March 3, 1845, and March 3, 1847, the ocean mails were transported by sailing vessels, as their voyages might occur, for a small gratuity, payable on each letter at the port of delivery, and consequently no payments were made prior to the fiscal year of 1848 for the transportation of the mails from the United States to foreign countries.

The act of March 3, 1845, to provide for transportation of mails to foreign countries, and other purposes, authorized the Postmaster-General to contract for transportation of United States mails between any port of the United States and a port or ports of foreign powers whenever in his opinion public interest will be promoted; contracts to be made if to Postmaster-General it appeared public interest required it for any greater period than four nor more than ten years; and with American citizens; mails to be transported in American vessels by American citizens. (5 United States Statutes at Large, 748, 749, 750.)

Under the provisions of the above act a contract between the Postmaster-General and the Ocean Steam Navigation Company, C. H. Sand, president, for the conveyance of the United States mails from New York to Southampton and Bremen, was entered into. The service contracted for covered a period of ten years.

Without specifying the annual detail of payment, the total amount paid for this service for the ten years was $1,833,883.25, from 1848 to 1857, inclusive.

It will be observed that the foregoing act gave the Postmaster-General authority "to contract for the transportation of the United States mails between any port of the United States and the port or ports of any foreign power whenever in his opinion the public interest would thereby be promoted." It prescribed no limitation in regard to the amount of compensation to be allowed for such transportation.

The act of March 3, 1847, authorized the Postmaster-General to cause a mail to be transported once a week, and oftener if he thought public interest required it, from New Orleans via Galveston, Passo Cavallo, Brazos de St. Jago, to Tampico, with return mails, the service to be performed by contract, or use of public steamers now in service of War Department in the Gulf of Mexico, with consent of head of Department; $130,000 appropriated for service, to continue in force during the war; also to contract for transporting mail from Charleston, S. C., to Chagres, touching at Saint Augustine and Key West, and also at Havana, if deemed expedient, and across the isthmus to Panama, the mail to be conveyed from Charleston to Chagres and from Panama to Aspinwall in steamship every two months, provided expenditure did not exceed $100,000 per annum. (9 United States Statutes at Large, 200.)

The act of June 27, 1848, authorized the Postmaster-General to charge upon and collect from all letters carried in foreign packets the same rates of postage which the Government to which such foreign packets belonged imposed upon letters, &c., conveyed in American packets. This act also prohibited the assignment or transfer of contracts made subsequent to the passage of the act unless by consent of Postmaster-General or Secretary of Navy. (9 United States Statutes at Large, 241, 242.)

The act of March 3, 1851, authorized the Postmaster-General, by and with the consent of the President of the United States, to reduce or enlarge from time to time rates of postage upon letters and all other mailable matter between United States and foreign countries for purpose of making better postal arrangements with other governments, or counteracting any adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with foreign countries. (9 United States Statutes at Large, 589.)

The act of August 5, 1854, authorized and directed the Postmaster-General to continue mail between Charleston, Key West, and Havana during August and September by a competent steamer, as it was then performed during ten months in the year; $10,000 appropriated for payment. (10 United States Statutes at Large, 588.)

Agreeably to above acts of 1847, 1848, 1851, and 1854 contracts covering a period of eleven years were entered into between the Postmaster-General and M. C. Mordecai, contractor for the conveyance of the United States mails between the ports of Charleston, Savannah, Key West, and Havana, and the total sum granted in compensation for said service amounted to an aggregate of $573,418.22 (from 1849 to 1859, inclusive).

Contracts agreeably to the act of March 3, 1847, were also executed between the Postmaster-General and the Ocean Steam Navigation Company (M. Livingston, agent) for the conveyance of the United States mails from New York to Havre, for which the sum of $1,060,378.19 was paid (from 1851 to 1858, inclusive); and between the Secretary of the Navy and E. K. Collins and associates for the conveyance of the United States mails between New York and Liverpool, for which the sum of $5,212,091.89 was paid (from 1850 to 1858, inclusive).

Contracts were entered into between the Postmaster-General and C. H. Aspinwall (assignee of Arnold Harris) for the conveyance of the United States mails between San Francisco, Astoria, and Panama, agreeably to the acts of March 3, 1847, and of March 3, 1851, for which the sum of $3,467,763.93 was paid (from 1850 to 1860, inclusive); and between the Secretary of the Navy and George Law and associates (assignees of A. G. Sloo) for the conveyance of the United States mails from New York to Aspinwall, for which the sum of $2,889,510.79 was paid (from October 1, 1848, to June 30, 1851, and from 1852 to 1860, inclusive).

The act of August 30, 1852, authorized the Postmaster-General to contract for a term of five years, and for a sum not exceeding $100,000 per year, for a tri-monthly mail from New Orleans via Tampico to Vera Cruz and back, in steam-vessels, not less than 800 tons burden (10 United States Statutes at Large, 38), and was the authority for a contract between the Postmaster-General and E. H. Carmick for the conveyance of United States mails from New Orleans to Vera Cruz, for which the sum of $167,584.96 was paid (from 1853 to 1858, inclusive).

The act of March 3, 1855, authorized the transportation of foreign mails on eighteen different lines and appropriated for that year and certain subsequent years $4,137,040.41. (10 United States Statutes at Large, 681, 682.)

The act of June 14, 1858, restricted the compensation on foreign mails to sea and inland postage, and is in the following terms:

SEC. 5. The Postmaster-General may cause mails to be transported between the United States and foreign ports by steamship, for the sea and United States inland postage, and sea postage only if by a foreign vessel; preference to be given American vessels. (11 United States Statutes at Large, 364.)

The preference given to American steamships in this section was repealed April 17, 1862.

The total appropriation under this act was $1,315,850 on six different lines. This act also authorized contracts for carrying United States mails with certain American steamship lines, namely:

*October 1, 1859, to June 30, 1860.

The act of June 15, 1860, was substantially the reaffirmation of section 5 of the act of June 14, 1858. It provided for the allowance of sea and inland postage to vessels of American register, and for sea postage to foreign vessels (preference being given to American steamships). The preference authorized by this act as also the act of June 14, 1858, was repealed as heretofore stated by the law of April 17, 1862. (12 United States at Large, 39.)

The act of February 19, 1861, appropriated $350,000 per annum for tri-monthly mail service from New York to San Francisco, via Panama, and authorized the deduction of the postage received from the amount thus appropriated. Under this law the Postmaster-General made a contract with Cornelius Vanderbilt to carry into execution its provision. (United States Statutes at Large, 133.)

The act of May 28, 1864, authorized monthly mail communication between Brazil and the United States by first-class sea-going steamships of not less than 2,000 tons burden, sufficient in number to perform twelve round trips or voyages per annum between a port of the United States, north of the Potomac River, and Rio de Janeiro in Brazil, touching at St. Thomas, Bahia, and Pernambuco, expenditure for this service not to exceed $150,000 per year and to continue for ten years from September 1, 1865. (15 United States Statutes at Large, 93, 99.)

Under the provisions of this act the Postmaster-General entered into a contract with the New York and Brazil Steamship Company which required a total expenditure of $1,500,000 (from 1866 to 1876, inclusive).

The acts of February 17, 1865, and February 18, 1867, authorized the Postmaster-General to invite proposals for transporting foreign mails between San Francisco and China and Japan, contract to go into effect January 1, 1867. The act limited the expenditure to $500,000 per annum, and called for twelve round trips annually. Under these acts the Pacific Mail Steamship Company contracted with the Government of the United States to perform the service, for which they received a total compensation of $4,583,333.32, covering a period of ten years from 1867 to 1877 inclusive. (15 United States Statutes at Large, 394, 430.)

The act of March 2, 1867, authorized the Postmaster-General to advertise for proposals by monthly mail service between San Francisco and Honolulu by means of first-class American steamships; but not to consider any bids amounting to over $75,000 for twelve round trips annually. Pursuant to the authority given by this act, the Postmaster-General contracted with the California, Oregon and Mexican Steamship Company, paying a sum of $425,000 for the service, from 1868 to 1874 inclusive. (14 United States Statutes at Large, 543, 544.)

COMPULSORY SECTIONS AND PRESENT LAWS.

The compulsory acts constitute sections 3976 and 4203 of the Revised Statutes, and are in the following terms:

SEC. 3976. The master of any vessel of the United States, bound from any port therein to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port of the United States, shall, before clearance, receive on board and securely convey all such mails as the Post-Office Department, or any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States abroad, shall offer; and he shall promptly deliver the same, on arriving at the port of distination, to the proper officer, for which he shall receive 2 cents for every letter so delivered; and upon the entry of every such vessel returning from any foreign port, the master thereof shall make oath that he has promptly delivered all the mail placed on board said vessel before clearance from the United States; and if he shall fail to make such oath the vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel of the United States. (Revised Statutes of the United States, chapter 9, page 769, 1878, approved June 8, 1872.)

SEC. 4203. All vessels belonging to the citizens of the United States, and bound from any port in the United States to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port in the United States, shall before clearance receive on board and securely convey all such mails as the Post-Office Department of the United States or any minister, consul, or commercial agent of the United States abroad shall offer, and shall promptly deliver to the proper authorities on arriving at the port of destination, and shall receive for such service such reasonable compensation as may be allowed by law. (Approved March 25, 1864; 13 Statutes, page 36.)

Both of these sections were repealed by section 23 of the act approved June 26, 1884, commonly known as the "Dingley bill." The repealing clause took effect April 1, 1885.

The entire expenditure on account of the foreign mail service from 1848 to 1885, inclusive, amounts to $32,184,950.57, of which sum foreign vessels have received $7,123,117.63 and American vessels have received $25,061,832.94.

All prior legislation upon this subject has been merged into or superseded by sections 4007, 4008, and 4009 of the Revised Statutes, which I herewith submit:

SEC. 4007. The Postmaster-General may, after advertising for proposals, enter into contracts for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country whenever the public interest will thereby be promoted.

SEC. 4008. The mail between the United States and any foreign port or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port shall be transported in steamships; but the Postmaster-General may have such transportation performed by sailing vessels when the service can be facilitated thereby.

SEC. 4009. For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port or between the ports of the United States, touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow as compensation, if by United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign steamship or by a sailing vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mails so transported.

I have now given a comprehensive summary of the consecutive legislative history of the foreign mail service, and the expenditure it has involved. In this résumé I have adhered to the almost literal phraseology of the several acts, simply discarding and eliminating such provisions as related to minor and technical detail, and which were not germane to the cardinal and relevant features of the respective enactments.

SUBSIDY LAW.

Mr. Chairman, we now come to the consideration of the act of March 3, 1885, commonly and properly known as the "subsidy clause" of the post-office bill of last year, which is in the following terms:

Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails: For transportation of foreign mails, including transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder, at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the mails so contracted shall be carried on American steamships, and that the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed one-half of the sum hereby appropriated.

Before presenting an outline of what seem to me conclusive reasons set forth by the Postmaster-General, in virtue of which he found it impracticable to carry out the provisions of the act, I think it proper to give a synopsis of the initiatory steps which reached their culmination in the act itself. It has been charged that this act was the culmination of a well-conceived plan which first found legislative expression in what is known as the Dingley bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Missouri permit a correction?

Mr. DOCKERY. I regret that I am not able to yield to the gentleman now, as my time is so limited. This plan, if it be true that there was one, first looked to the repeal of the compulsory law, and thus, having deprived the Government of the power to compel the carrying of mails as a condition precedent to clearance, sought, as the second step, to compel Congress to subsidize these lines, or refuse to carry the mails.

In the debate on this measure which was had at the second session of the last Congress, Mr. ELLIS, of Louisiana, the able champion of the measure, stated on the floor the reason why the law was repealed in the following terms:

It was the action of a Democratic Congress which repealed last spring the infamous law by which the American steamship has been taken for public service without just compensation. That law was repealed in the expectation that at this session we would take some action looking to adequate payment for this character of mail service.

Again in the debate of February 13, 1885, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] charged that the repealing clause was a part of the plan to make it possible to pass the act of March 3, 1885. He made this declaration in the presence of Mr. DINGLEY, of Maine, the author of the Dingley bill, who made no denial of the charge, and the colloquy was in the following words:

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Chairman, it has been said that we can have our mail carried on the ocean for $55,000 a year under the existing law, while the bill presented by the committee proposes to change that existing law so as to require the Government to expend about $600,000 for the same service.

Mr. DINGLEY. It does not require it. That is only the limit that may be expended.

Mr. MILLS. Yes, but it will go to the extreme limit; that is what the bill is for. It is made for that purpose.

Mr. DINGLEY. But the service is still open to competition.

There the gentleman from Maine comes in with the persuasive argument of competition and low rates which will follow.

Mr. MILLS. But the very bill which bears the gentleman's name which passed through Congress passed for the purpose of making it possible for this subsidy to pass through Congress.

I refer to this part of the history connected with the repealing clause not for the purpose of discussing that measure, but that the House may see under what conditions the subsidy clause of the last Congress presented itself for consideration.

The subsidy clause as originally reported by the Appropriations Committee was stricken from the Post-Office bill in the Committee of the Whole, February 13, 1885, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, of Indiana, by a vote of 105 to 97. This action of the committee was reaffirmed in the House on the following day by a vote of 130 to 112. When the Post-Office bill went to the Senate, the subsidy clause was again inserted in the bill, and again rejected by the House, after debate, March 3, 1885, by a vote of 128 to 132. Finally, on the morning of March 4, 1885, the Democratic House sullenly yielded, rather than take the chances of an extra session of Congress, and, by a vote of 98 to 89, acceded to the demands of the Senate. The House was thus clearly coerced into the acceptance of this measure.

Mr. BLOUNT. If my colleague will permit an interruption I wish to simply add to what he has stated that the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. TOWNSHEND] formally announced to the House that the Senate would never consent to the passage of a post-office appropriation bill unless that subsidy clause was inserted in it.

Mr. DOCKERY. The statement of my colleague is correct, and I thank him for calling the fact to the attention of the House.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL'S REASONS.

The Postmaster-General states the first reason that induced the conclusion that it was "inexpedient and improper to exert the authority of the act * * * was the apparent impossibility of applying its provisions to the conditions affecting the various American steamship carriers, without such a course of proceeding as would have been inadmissible to the Department to pursue under the law itself." This he illustrates by citing the authentic and quasi-official computation of the miles sailed last year and expected to be sailed this year by all American companies, which being 2,050,000, the total compensation at the maximum rate would exceed $1,025,000, or over two and one-half times the utmost authorized expenditure. "As the act required a letting to the lowest responsible bidder * * * no money could be paid on mileage accounts outside."

Now "only two routes are navigated by more than one American company; one between New York and Havana and the other between San Francisco and Japan and China." Hence, in the nature of the case, competition was restricted to these two routes. There thus remained but two alternatives—the one, to make "choice of certain routes, whose total mileage would have demanded no more than the limited sum, and after the futile parade of advertisements for impossible competition to have distributed the whole bounty to the chosen, excluding entirely the others;" the other alternative, to have so prearranged the "advertisements to meet the circumstances of the only possible bidders that, by concerted understanding with all American companies, or such as the Department chose to give the money to, contracts might have been made for such sums to each that the whole appropriation could have been divided between them."

The Postmaster-General most pertinently and properly signalizes the first alternative as characterized intrinsically by injustice, in that it would discriminate entirely in favor of one company to the exclusion of another; and this unfairness would invite the damaging reaction of the disfavored lines promptly and peremptorily refusing further service as mail-carriers to the Government.

The Postmaster-General suggests that if there be reasons why the Government should award different measures of compensation growing out of considerations other than their varying mileage, yet that the terms of the statute allow no lawful means of discrimination, as it "requires the contract * * * to be let to the lowest responsible bidder;" and thus the Postmaster-General vindicates, I think, the insuperable obstacles in the way of the first alternative.

As enforcing the impracticability of the second alternative, he states that "if a contract were awarded to either of the companies on the trans-Pacific route, and another to either of those plying between New York and Havana, both public injury and private injustice would be wrought;" for the public would lose the service of the other company on either route, and these two companies would be denied privileges to which they were equally entitled with their favored rivals. And the inexpediency of such a recourse he illustrates by "the usages of the transatlantic carriage, where the services of the swiftest ship" about to sail is employed at will, "when mail is to be dispatched, no special contracts being made."

To obviate the obstacle referred to, the suggestion occurred of two contracts on each route to accord with the respective sailing days of the competing companies.

In brief—

The Postmaster-General further argues—

the Department must have specially preconsidered all the peculiar features of the lines and business of each of the companies which would affect the contract or competition for it; must have carefully estimated the miles of sailing each would perform and the price per mile each might bid; must have received the concurrence of all in the scheme; and so arranging as to receive but one bid for each contract advertised for, and that one at the prearranged price per mile, or practically making the several contracts before the advertisements, might have distributed the appropriation among the American steamship companies ratably according to their mileage.

But that, the Postmaster-General properly argues, would have been subversive of the authority which was to "secure competition and to award the contract to the lowest bidder." He further pertinently suggests that steamship companies would naturally demur to an overture whereby the ship carrying "the heavy and important mails took ratably no more than those whose services were comparatively insignificant."

Another potent difficulty lay in the fact that increased sailings might be demanded by public convenience, because the whole amount would be involved in the original estimate and contracts. And hence there would be a quietus rather than stimulus given to American enterprise in founding new lines. Further, as the appropriation was but for one year and the power of making contracts limited to a single appropriation, the procedure would have been but a temporary expedient of distributing a particular sum and foreshadowed serious future difficulty.

And in this connection the Postmaster-General adds that but one other course remained, which was for the Department to arbitrarily prescribe to every company a price per mile, and to "disburse the authorized sum of $400,000 according to its own views of justice." Such a plan, he states, would have been unwarranted by the law.

The act—

puts at the disposal of the Department, in the ordinary terms of appropriation, the sum of $800,000 for transportation of the foreign mails, warranting thereby its entire expenditure, if necessary, under previously existing powers. The mere authority to make contracts on the mileage plan of compensation with American steamships is superadded. No mandate to pursue that course is expressed or implied. Authority to let contracts for transportation of the ocean mails, after advertisement for proposals, has long existed on the statute-book unexercised for years, and it was never thought to be obligatory on the Department to exert it.

If there was any room for doubt as to the true intent and meaning of this act it ought to be set at rest by an examination of the debate had on its passage, and the deliberate utterances of those gentlemen who had the measure in charge. In the House, February 10, 1885, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] made the following declaration:

Mr. DINGLEY. It is to be observed that there is nothing in the measure proposed which requires the Postmaster-General to pay a single dollar to an American line of steamers. He may invite proposals for carryng the mails by American steamers to any country that he regards it proper to do so, and when he has received bids for this service he may reject any and all proposals which in his judgment it is not for the public interest to accept. If he can not obtain a proposal satisfactory to him he may send our mails by foreign competing steamers or by way of England. The absolute discretion vested in him in the foreign as in the domestic mail service, limited, however, in the case of the foreign service to the maximum sum of 50 cents per mile and the aggregate of $600,000, would make the Postmaster-General master of the situation in the case of the adoption of the measure proposed.

Again, March 3, 1885, the following colloquy confirms the opinion of Mr. DINGLEY:

Mr. HORR. This bill simply says that the incoming Democratic Postmaster-General may make such contracts with American vessels for carrying our foreign mails as he may now make with our coastwise vessels for carying the mails on the coast.

Mr. BINGHAM. For one year only?

Mr. HORR. For one year only.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE. Does this apply to any particular line in this country?

Mr. HORR. Certainly not.

Mr. MORSE. Then it is entirely optional with the Postmaster-General to use the appropriation or not as he may see proper.

Mr. HORR. Every dollar of it is left subject to his judgment. If he does not think that the service demands that a contract should be made with any vessel or any route he need not make it.

And, instead of my friend from Indiana arraigning Democrats here for voting on this thing, I say to you, when you vote against this proposition you vote a lack of confidence in your own Postmaster-General, which does not come with good grace from you.

It will be remembered that Mr. Horr, of Michigan, had the measure in charge, and was its most vigorous champion and advocate. It therefore clearly appears that the act simply gave the Postmaster-General authority to contract with American steamships and fix the maximum rate at 50 cents per mile. In no respect is the act mandatory; on the contrary, it said to the Postmaster-General, "The discretion is given you to advertise for this service, if in your opinion the public interest demands it." If Congress intended to make the act mandatory it would have so expressed it; but it did not do so. In the exercise of a sound and proper discretion the Postmaster-General has been subjected to unmerited, unjust, and, I think, unfair criticism. His position on this question reflects not only the views of the President, but, as I believe, also the overwhelming voice of the Democratic party.

The Postmaster-General further quotes in ample vindication of his position the following pertinent remarks of Hon. James Campbell, from his report as Postmaster-General in 1856:

By the act of the 3d of March, 1845, the Postmaster-General is authorized, under the restrictions and provisions of the existing laws, to contract for the transportation of the mails of the United States between any of the ports of the United States and a port or ports of any foreign power whenever, in his opinion, the public interest will thereby be promoted. It is made his duty to report to the next ensuing Congress a copy of each of these contracts, with a statement of the amount of postage derived under the same. These contracts must be made with citizens of the United States, the mail carried in American vessels by American citizens, and the contracts may be made for a term not exceeding ten years, and must contain stipulations reserving the right of the two Houses of Congress to terminate them at any time by a joint resolution. The power given by this act is one under which large expenditures involving millions could be created, but neither of my predecessors nor myself has ever used the authority thus given. Believing that Congress should reserve to itself the right to say to how many and to what foreign ports the mails of the United States should be transported and the amount of money which should be expended for that purpose, I would recommend the repeal of so much of this act as confers the great power on the Postmaster-General.

It occurs to me that the Postmaster-General makes appropriate comment upon the citation when he remarks:

No rule of interpretation authorizes the presumption that Congress designed another construction to be given similar terms in this act, or a greater obligation to employ a discretionary authority here. Presumably, it was supposed additional power might become necessary to secure the service, because the compulsory law had been repealed. But no duty is enjoined to spend this appropriation needlessly more than another. As with every such grant of money for the public use, the true mandate of this law to its executive officer is plain: to honestly use so much of the sum provided as shall be reasonably necessary and may be rightly used to procure the transportation of the mails, and no more. At that point the law bids him to stop, not enlarge, expenditure. No duty is more imperatively imposed than the latter; none more justly due the people.

The true rule seems to be that the Department ought, when the Congress submits the question to its discretion, to pay such reasonable price to its carriers as in fair dealing between them and the people shall justly recompense their service, in view of its nature and the cost and burden of their performance of it.

The Postmaster-General accordingly carefully "directed inquiry to ascertain what" was "a just compensation to our mail carriers by sea, and whether it could be paid under the pre-existing powers of the Department." He annexes "tables which show the business done by each American steamship line for the postal service during the past year, the weight of mail carried by each vessel, the price paid and what it would have been at the full rates charged on the same lines * * * at parcel-dispatch rates, and what if the sea and inland postage had been paid."

I will give a few details which fortify the position the Postmaster-General assumes upon them. He first adverts to the merely nominal trouble and less than nominal risk incurred in the reception, storage, and delivery of mails by steamships. He demonstrates that the "express" or "parcel-dispatch" service is quite as burdensome and expensive as the mail service; and that an equal comparison might be sustained in the matter of passenger luggage. He cites the port advantages accruing from carrying United States mails to foreign countries. He shows, from a glance at the tables, "that if the quantity of mail carried be considerable the compensation is generous;" that the amount paid for mail by weight was over thirty-four times the cost of the like weight of freight, and nearly four times the charge of an equal quantity of dispatch matter; and that the figures show the "sea rate of postage to be abundant;" that "the American lines have received their full compensation for the quantity of mail transported;" that "but 8.37 per cent. of our foreign letter mails last year was sent to all the countries and islands of this continent and across the Pacific seas, and not so much by all the American steamships;" that "the companies" carrying mails "have been in existence for years as common carriers, with a view to the gains" thereby, and "not primarily as Government carriers, and have been employed by the Government in the same general manner as by other shippers," agreeably with the regular sailings and destinations of the several vessels, with no regulations imposed as to speed, frequency, times of arrival or departure, or otherwise; that the statute authorized "the entire sea and inland postage to be paid to American steamships," while allowing only "sea postage" to foreign bottoms, the fact is that the latter rate "is sufficiently remunerative to command the service."

The Postmaster-General further states:

Upon a review of all these facts and reasons it seemed a plain duty, the only admissible course, for the Government to decline to make contracts upon the mileage plan, and await the meeting of Congress, to which the subject might be referred for consideration and direction. It involved but a few months of delay, and in the mean time the American vessels could be paid a compensation more than three times as great as most of them have received for similar service during the past seven years.

I wish to call especial attention of the House to the following words of the Postmaster-General upon the question of subsidizing American steamship lines:

Much has been said about employing the postal appropriation to aid American commerce. When Congress shall desire to invest the Post-Office Department with care for that object it can not be doubted it will easily choose language which will plainly convey the purpose and impose the duty. Until then that Department can not rightfully employ the moneys appropriated for the postal service to secure objects not intrusted to its care, however meritorious in themselves.

THE PRESIDENT'S VIEWS.

In further explanation of the reason why the Postmaster-General declined to exercise the authority conferred under the subsidy clause, I submit herewith the views of the President as expressed in his first annual message to Congress:

It was decided with my approbation after a sufficient examination to be inexpedient for the Post-Office Department to contract for carrying our foreign mails under the additional authority given by the last Congress. The amount limited was inadequate to pay all within the purview of the law the full rate of 50 cents per mile, and it would have been unjust and unwise to have given it to some and denied it to others. Nor could contracts have been let under the law to all at a rate to have brought the aggregate within the appropriation without such practical prearrangement of terms as would have violated it.

The rate of sea and inland postage which was proffered under another statute clearly appears to be a fair compensation for the desired service, being three times the price necessary to secure transportation by other vessels upon any route, and much beyond the charges made to private persons for service not less burdensome.

* * * * * * *

Whatever may be thought of the policy of subsidizing any line of public conveyance, or travel, I am satisfied that it should not be done under cover of an expenditure incident to the administration of a Department; nor should there be any uncertainty as to the recipients of the subsidy or any discretion left to an executive officer as to its distribution. If such gifts of the public money are to be made for the purpose of aiding any enterprise in the supposed interest of the public, I can not but think that the amount to be paid and the beneficiary might better be determined by Congress than any other way.

THE INCREASED COST.

I wish to say a word now, in answer to my able and eloquent friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], who addressed the House on yesterday. He asked the House with seeming earnestness—and he is always an earnest man—what right the Postmaster-General had to assume or to expect that the maximum rate allowed by this bill would be granted. In reply I will say that the benefits of past experience fully justified the Postmaster-General in the declaration and opinion which the gentleman from Michigan is pleased to style a "baseless assumption." Had I the time to read here the consecutive legislative history touching this question I could authenticate that in every case from 1848 down to 1885, in which Congress has authorized a maximum rate for this service, this rate so fixed has been allowed by the Postmaster-General; and in virtue of this established precedent the Postmaster-General had a right to assume that the maximum rate would be allowed under the present law. He was, furthermore, authorized in reaching such conclusion because, as gentlemen well know, only two American lines have competition. Again, if Congress re-enact the law of March 3, 1885, I am fully satisfied that the maximum rate will be secured by the steamships; and the service performed during the last fiscal year for $49,048 will cost $1,025,000—an increase over the present expenditure of $975,952.

Now, I desire to refer to another statement made by my good friend from Michigan. On page 12 of his report on the proposed compulsory law, that will soon engage the attention of the House, he makes this statement in conjunction with some of his colleagues on the committee. Referring to the amount expended by England for carrying the mails to the West Indies, Central and South America, he says:

As nearly as can be ascertained, the amount paid by the United States for the same service during this time, that is, from 1862 to 1880, has not exceeded $350,000.

The facts, however, are, as my friend would have discovered had he gone a little further in his investigation, not that $350,000 only had been expended in such service, but that from 1849 to 1860, inclusive, the Government of the United States had expended for the transportation of the mails to these countries $7,565,829.12; and from 1861 to 1882, inclusive, the time referred to in his report, we have expended $3,048,828.80. The amount shown by the table presented by the minority as paid by England for transportation to these countries from 1862 to 1880, inclusive, was $22,500,000, during which time, as I have said, the United States paid $3,048,828.80, instead of $350,000, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan. I further wish to call the attention of our friends to the fact that the English mail steamers had to travel to the West Indies, a distance of 3,000 miles, while those of the United States were required to travel only from 1,200 to 1,500 miles. The English mail steamers, again, had to sail 4,000 miles to Central America and the northernmost countries of South America, while the United States steamships, at the same time, had only from 1,800 to 2,000 miles to traverse in order to compass the same points.

When, therefore, you take into account the amount expended by England as compared with that expended by the United States, the distances traveled by English ships as compared with American ships, the English ship has, in fact, received a less rate of compensation per mile than the American ship. For myself, I desire to say right here that I think a great deal of our flag; that, indeed, I do not yield to any member on the Republican side in admiration of that emblem. Perhaps I think a little more of it when it is associated with an appropriation. [Laughter.] But I am for the flag! And I wish to say, with all earnestness, that I, together with the Democratic members of the committee, as well as of the House, are in favor of adequately and liberally compensating American steamships for this service. Indeed, the only proper question now before the committee in that connection is, "What amount is it necessary to appropriate in order to pay sea and inland postage?" For that is the amount authorized by the law; and in this bill such sum can not be exceeded.

But discussion on this point has taken a wide range, and in view of this fact it may be well to consider several questions not properly germane to the subject. One query that calls for answer is, "What is adequate compensation to American steamers for this service?" If by any method of comparison or examination of facts I can ascertain what such compensation is, then for that sum I wish and purpose to vote; and if the present law does not make ample provision to that end, then I shall favor most heartily any measure that will compensate American ship-owners for their services to the Government. But so far as I am concerned, speaking from a business standpoint, I can never support any legislation which proposes to subsidize American lines of steamships for the purpose of aiding commerce. Our Republican friends have a good deal to say in regard to the unsatisfactory condition of our merchant marine and the fact that our ship-owners are not sufficiently paid.

REPUBLICAN PARTY RESPONSIBLE FOR LOSS OF MERCHANT MARINE.

Now, if my recollection serves me aright, I may be pardoned for a reference to the fact that the Republican party has been in supreme and virtually unchallenged control of the Government during the past quarter of a century. Then, manifestly, if the laws be wrong; if they have operated harshly upon our shipping interests; if they have driven American steamships from the seas; if our flag is no longer to be seen upon the waters of the globe, the Republican and not the Democratic party is responsible for this deplorable condition of affairs. When we were deprived of the control of the Government we left you in possession of a splendid merchant marine, manned by American sailors, and carrying nearly all the commerce of this great country. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. And the Alabama and Shenandoah were sent out to destroy that commerce.

Mr. DOCKERY. I know the statement hurts. When we again come to our fathers' house we find only 15 per cent. of the commerce of the Republic—so great in all its resources—carried in American vessels and these vessels manned by whom? By American seamen? By no means, sir! Ninety-five per cent. of the sailors on the vessels left carrying our flag are foreigners. Foreigners man the few American ships that are remaining!

I ask gentlemen on the other side who are responsible for this condition of affairs?

Mr. BRUMM. Semmes, who commanded the Alabama, was not a foreigner.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman is true to the instincts of a great many leaders of the Republican party; but, I believe, untrue to the heart-feeling of the masses of that great organization. There is hardly a question that can be presented for the consideration of the American Congress without having the ensanguined garment flaunted by some one in the face of the American people. I hope that I may live to see the day when we shall no longer hear these sectional tirades, and when the Republican party shall be overthrown in all the departments of the Government, for the one reason if for no other that its leadership stands as a hindrance to the growth of that feeling of fraternity which seeks to bind together in the bands of a common interest all the sections of this great country. And I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] should be one of those leaders who so frequently and so persistently flaunts the "bloody shirt" upon this floor.

Mr. BRUMM. When your party stops brandishing the bloody dagger, then we will stop waving the "bloody shirt."

Mr. DOCKERY. I trust the gentleman will not further interrupt me; albeit I know "the galled jade winces."

Mr. BRUMM. Not as much as you think. You seem to feel it worse.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire to deal at present with this question of commerce as it presents itself in connection with the mail service, if I can have the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to proceed.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOCKERY. No, sir. I should gladly yield, but my time is limited. I was about to submit another thought when I was interrupted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I am heartily in favor of any measure that will restore our merchant marine, to the end that our products, seeking the open markets of the world, can be carried in our own vessels. I am heartily in favor of that proposition; but I wish to see it accomplished otherwise than under the guise of a subsidy as compensation for carrying our mails. If gentlemen on the other side of the House really desire to benefit the carrying trade of the country, they must assist in enacting some legislation that will inherently benefit the business of carrying on this trade.

I am aware that some of our steamship lines do but very little business; but how are they to get business by being paid extravagant sums for carrying the mails? They carry but little mail for the very reason that they do but little business. Take, for illustration, the systems of inland mail transportation. There you have a barometer which indicates the condition of the business of the country with unerring certainty. Whenever business is depressed, whenever times are hard, whenever money is scarce, whenever thousands of laboring men are out of employment, whenever such a condition of affairs obtains throughout the country it manifests itself immediately in the decreased receipts of the Post-Office Department. And so the decreased mail revenue of the foreign service when such results appear come from the decreasing business of our steamship lines.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that prior to the Berne conference the compensation of ocean mail-carriers was adequate, and the reduction made by that international convention was offered as a reason in favor of the passage of the present "subsidy law." A Senator in another body, in presenting this view, used the following language:

The Senator alludes to section 4009 as the section under which they shall receive their pay if contracted with. Let me call his attention to the history of that legislation. When that section was put on the statute-book how much does the Senator think there was permitted to be paid under it for a letter carried by an American ship? Does the Senator know? Under that section when it became a law you could pay 40 cents a letter to half the foreign ports, 25 cents a letter to China and Japan, 30 cents a letter to Australia. Liberal pay for carrying United States mails when section 4009 was put on the statute-book. How comes it now cut down to 3 or 4 or 5 cents a letter—a beggardly pittance? The great nations of the earth met at Paris and at Berne, and for the good of the whole world they agreed upon certain postal regulations and upon certain postages that should be paid upon letters and papers, and they cut it down to the sea and inland postage of to-day—about 5 cents. What did they do? They immediately doubled their mail pay to every steamer they had in their service.

That is to say, if I understand the Senator, that for "the good of the whole world" by unanimous action they reduced the postage to 5 cents a letter, and thereupon each nation represented (twenty-one in all) resolved that while such action was wise and would result in the promotion of the general welfare, that for themselves they would decline to be beneficiaries, and therefore "doubled their mail pay" at once. Strange logic! To what resorts are we sometimes driven, when we would by special pleading seek to sustain and advocate unwise legislation!

The following tables, compiled in the office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, disclose the fact that the mail business to the countries named was more remunerative during the last fiscal year than during the year just prior to the adoption of the international postal-union rates. In other words, under the reduced rates the volume of business has increased, and the compensation during the last fiscal year was $137,519.87 instead of $95,769.23 under the exorbitant rates that prevailed prior to the Berne conference.

STEAMSHIP AND COASTWISE COMPENSATION.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] in his able argument presented the House with a statement of the amounts paid to certain steamboat lines, "for our coastwise and inland service," as compared with the compensation received by certain American lines that carry the mails to foreign ports. The comparison he institutes is not a fair one because he selected for the purpose the best paid coastwise lines and the poorest paid steamship lines, and therefore on this basis reaches the conclusion that the American steamers would be inadequately paid "even at the full rate of sea and inland postage."

I have examined with much care the tables he presents with the view of ascertaining the amount of mail transported by these American lines. The examination not only discloses the unfairness of the comparison, but also the fact that this limited compensation to American steamers was due to the small amount of mail transported.

The full rate of sea and inland postage will liberally compensate them for all service they render the Government in the transportation of mails.

Again, Mr. Chairman, as bearing on the question of adequate compensation to American steamers, I find on page 9, of the "Views of the Minority," submitted by the gentleman from Michigan and some of his colleagues on the Post-Office Committee, on House bill No. 4864, the following tables, wherein he institutes a comparison between the compensation paid to "American steamships for the foreign service" and the compensation paid to "steamers in the coastwise service."

The gentleman and his colleagues conclude from the following tables that "it sufficiently appears how liberally we pay for the inland and coastwise steamboat service, and in contrast how insignificant the compensation awarded the American steamships for carrying the foreign mails." I am ready to concede, Mr. Chairman, that the conclusion is fully justified by the data as presented in these tables; but let us examine further and see whether or not our friends of the minority have not unintentionally fallen into an error. It will be observed that the rate of compensation for the transportation of mails by railways as presented by this table, is $0.1095; for star-route service, $0.0652; for steamboat and coastwise, $0.159, and foreign steamship service $0.0225 per mile.

The table so far as railway, star-route, and steamboat service is involved shows the actual number of miles traveled in conveying the mails both going and coming. While it is true that the table shows that American steamships made a total mileage of 2,052,686 miles, it is also true that they carried the mails only one-half this distance, or 1,024,126 miles, and therefore received just twice the rate per mile as stated in the table.

The error into which our friends have fallen is easily explained. Prior to the adoption of the international postal treaty of Berne, which went into effect June 30, 1874, the Government of the United States paid the American steamers for carrying the mails for both the outward and return voyages, and received the sea and United States inland postage. Under the treaty of Berne, the Government from which the mail is dispatched retains all the postage chargeable, and the "expenses of transit are borne by the administration of the country of origin."

By the terms of this treaty the amount earned by all American steamers on regular lines, including "tramps" and occasional sailings, was $.045 per mile instead of $.0225, as stated by our friend from Michigan. Further, if these American lines had been paid the full rate of sea and inland postage, as tendered by the Postmaster-General, for the present fiscal year, they would have received an average mileage compensation of $.119, calculated on the basis of 10 cents per ounce for letter mail and 1 cent for two ounces on other articles. If the compensation had been fixed on the basis of three letters to the ounce, or 1 cent for other articles, they would have received $.145.

Let us now proceed with this investigation and take up the eight principal American lines. We find that they received during the last fiscal year, at sea-postage rates, an amount that would be equal to $.053 per mile. Had they accepted the tender of sea and inland postage made by the Postmaster-General, the compensation would have averaged $.144 per mile. The coastwise steamers received $.159 per mile on an average; in excess of only $.015 per mile in favor of the coastwise service.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. DOCKERY. I can not yield. You can make the correction in your own time.

Mr. DINGLEY. Well, if you want to misstate the facts——

Mr. DOCKERY. If I do not state the facts accurately you can have the privilege of correcting me in your own time. The difference in compensation is correctly stated.

It will be remembered also in this connection, as having an important bearing on the question of adequate compensation, that the coastwise steamers are compelled to make trips on schedule time, and for any failure to do so they are subject to fine under the laws and regulations of the Postal Department; while the ocean steamers are not compelled to leave on schedule time, but consult their own convenience and leave when they have a full cargo.

The following comparative statement shows the average amount paid per mile during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, for the transportation of United States mails by railway, star-routes, steamboat and coastwise service, American steamship service to foreign ports, and average amount paid to the eight principal American lines of steamships, and the amount that would have been paid if the American steamships had received the sea and inland postage on the mails conveyed:

Mr. PETERS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] ten minutes of my time.

Mr. DOCKERY. I thank my friend from Kansas for his courtesy, and invite the attention of my friends from Michigan and Maine to a suggestive fact. In this discussion, and at the time of the discussion of this question during the second session of the last Congress, England was held up as the great model, the examplar for this free American Republic, in the matter of ocean transportation. Statistics were submitted and arguments presented showing that her subsidy policy was the real basis upon which the prosperity of her merchant marine depended. This view of the question is held by many of our friends on the Republican side and by many gentlemen who two years ago, upon another question, were not disposed to follow in England's wake.

You will remember, Mr. Chairman, when this matter was under discussion that these same gentlemen held up England's policy on the tariff question as a "bugbear" by which to affright the American Congress, and thus keep it from cutting down the high rates of war taxation.

Why, sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] went so far as to bring to notice in that debate the fact that some English firm had honored our distinguished Speaker by christening a line of their goods with the "significant trade-mark, 'The Carlisle Shape.'" Thus was this trifling incident invoked to arouse prejudice against a low rate of taxation; and because we desired to relieve our people of the burdens of excessive taxation we were denounced as being connected with a "great political organization committed to the English system."

Sir, England's ocean mail service can only be fairly compared to our inland mail service, because England is compelled to subsidize her steamships liberally so that she may be able to reach her colonies in every quarter of the globe with due dispatch. We give liberal compensation for the carrying of our inland mails, as England does for the transportation of her ocean mails, not simply on the idea of what the service is worth or whether it is or can be made self-sustaining, but also with the more enlarged view of diffusing light, knowledge, and intelligence to all the citizens.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other phases of this question that I should like to discuss, but time fails me for further consideration. I have briefly stated some of the reasons which impel me to dissent from any measure proposing the subsidy of American steamships under the guise of compensation for carrying our foreign mails.

CONCLUSION.

Sir, I would not knowingly consent to any addition, however small, to the burdens now borne by the owners of American vessels who seek to carry the honored ensign of the Republic across the seas and into foreign ports. The burdens with which they have been weighted since the administration of public affairs passed out of the hands of the Democratic party twenty-five years ago have so handicapped the enterprise of our people in this direction as to virtually rob them of the success which American genius is wont to achieve wherever admitted to the field of healthy competition. The absence of our flag from the marts of trade and from the highways of commerce, where it was once a familiar sight, is sufficient proof of this assertion.

Sir, it is said that those who oppose subsidies are not actuated by that spirit of liberality and progress necessary to restore to American hands the welcome task of conveying to the markets of the world the products of American industry, and of bringing to our shores the needed commodities of other lands. In answer to this criticism, permit me to say, I readily concede that the party of which I am an humble member has made its mistakes; it, perhaps, has not at all times, nor in all things, kept pace with the spirit of the age; it may have committed its power to incompetent hands; it may have seemed inconsistent and contradictory in the declaration of some of its public policies; but, despite all these things, such strictures from leaders of the Republican party come with bad grace. That great party has controlled the Government for nearly a quarter of a century, and its mistaken, if not unfriendly, legislation has resulted in the almost total destruction of our merchant marine.

Sir, under Democratic administrations the Navy was at once the pet and the pride of that party, and under its fostering hand the interests and dimensions of our merchant marine grew and expanded until our flag responded to the breezes on every sea. How was this accomplished? Simply by such wise, patriotic, and timely legislation as secured to American enterprise its full scope of action, and gave to American seamen freedom to compete, on terms of equality, with the whole world.

Mr. Chairman, let us repeal restrictive navigation laws; strike off the shackles of grievous taxation; take down, in part at least, the wall which keeps out not only the commerce of the world but consigns us to the hermitage of our own shores. Do these things, and thereby unhand and unfetter the genius and the prowess of this people, and let them repossess themselves of the commercial advantages which, within the memory of the present generation, made the flag of our country a familiar sight upon all the waters of the globe.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that under this, the first Democratic administration within a quarter of a century, I wish to see the Navy of the United States restored to its "old-time strength" and the seas again floating American ships, owned by American citizens, manned by American crews, and protected under the broad ægis of the American flag. [Prolonged applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to be turned aside from the argument which I had mapped out in this case, by any of the references made by the gentleman last on the floor [Mr. DOCKERY] as to the responsibility of the Republican party in connection with the condition of the Navy. Had I the disposition to make any reference to the question, I might say in passing that when the Republican party obtained control of this Government and of the American Navy in 1861, it found that Navy scattered to the four quarters of the globe by the late Democratic Secretary of the Navy—so well scattered that it could scarcely secure even a tub on which to transport a message upon any of the waters of the Atlantic. I might also say that by the kind hand of Great Britain in fitting out during the war rebel cruisers, that preyed upon our commerce and upon the American marine, this marine, which was the pride of our nation, was almost obliterated from the seas.

I might also say that this Government, during the first years of the control of a Republican administration, was employed in preserving the Union, and had not time to look after these minor questions. I might further say that since the integrity of the Government has been established, since by the conclusion of the war and the settlement of the questions incident thereto, we have been in a position to devote attention to the American marine and the American Navy, the Democratic party has had control in the House of Representatives, has had control of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations in this House; and if there is any responsibility arising anywhere for our not having such a Navy as we ought to have at this time, it rests with the Democratic party of this country. That is the last reference that I shall make to-day to anything of a political nature. I will now discuss some of the provisions of the bill under consideration.

Away back in the olden time, when railroads were unknown, when telegraphs and telephones had not even assumed shape in the human imagination, when the masses were slaves to titled nobility, a crude system of postal transmission was provided for the benefit of kings and emperors. Rome, in the splendor of her power, constructed "royal ways," and prior to the Dark Ages had relays of couriers who traveled almost across the then known continent at the rate of 160 miles per day; but it was only for the convenience of sovereigns and nobles. The masses could look with reverence and admiration upon the fleet steed of the courier, but could not increase the precious postal parcel he carried by even so much as a lock of hair. It remained for the fugitives from the oppression of Great Britain whose feet first pressed the shores of America at Plymouth Rock and at Jamestown, to take the initial steps to inaugurate a postal system that is now the heritage of every one of the fifty millions of freemen throughout the length and breadth of our land.

It is not only interesting, but may serve to more fully impress the importance of some suggestions to follow, for me to refer briefly to the rise and progress of this system in America.

The first legislation upon the subject was in colonial Massachusetts as early as 1639. This provided that the house of Richard Fairbanks in Boston be designated as a receptacle for letters coming from across the seas or destined to foreign countries. Mr. Fairbanks was to take charge of such letters, send or deliver according to direction, and for his services was allowed a penny for each letter.

In colonial Virginia in 1657 it was made the duty of a planter to convey dispatches to the next plantation, and upon failure to do so, he forfeited a hogshead of tobacco.

It was not until 1672 that a post was established between New York and Boston, which made twelve trips a year, or one each month.

In the early days of the Continental Congress, a law was passed establishing a post-route from Falmouth, Me., to Savannah, Ga. The earliest law fixing graded rates of postage was passed in 1792, and as it remained in force with but slight change for fifty years, I will succinctly state the nine different rates provided in it:

	Cents.
First rate, 30 miles or less	6
Second rate, 30 to 60 miles	8
Third rate, 60 to 100 miles	10
Fourth rate, 100 to 150 miles	12
Fifth rate, 150 to 200 miles	15
Sixth rate, 200 to 250 miles	17
Seventh rate, 250 to 350 miles	20
Eighth rate, 350 to 450 miles	22
Ninth rate, 450 and over	25

During the existence of this law and up to 1836 the entire number of letters and packages mailed in the United States was only 100,000,000; during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, the number of stamps of all kinds, stamped envelopes, newspaper wrappers, and postal cards issued amounted to the fairy-like aggregate of 2,142,678,890, as shown by the last report of the Postmaster-General, page 731.

There are more than ten times as many letters transported annually now, than during the entire fifty years prior to 1836.

In 1836 we had 11,091 post-offices; in 1885, 51,252. In 1836 the gross revenue was $3,408,323; in 1885, $42,560,843.83. In 1836 expenditures were $3,841,766; in 1885, $49,602,188.41. In 1836, miles of post-routes, 118,264; in 1885, 365,251. In 1836, miles of transportation, 2,900,000; in 1885, 238,478,773.

In 1836 there was no registry system, no free-delivery system, no money-order system, no postal-note system, no special-delivery system.

Under the law of 1792 only letters and newspapers were mailable. In 1825 magazines were admitted; in 1845, all printed matter except bound books; in 1851 books weighing not more than 30 ounces were admitted; in 1852, books weighing not over 4 pounds; in 1861, packages not exceeding 4 pounds.

The first classification of mail matter was in 1863. It was then divided into first, second, and third-class mail matter. Letters constituted the first class, papers and magazines the second, and packages the third.

In 1873 seeds and roots of any weight were admitted, but in 1874 this character of mail matter was limited to 4 pounds.

In 1879 merchandise was admitted to the mails, and in this same year mailable matter was divided into four classes:

First. Written or sealed matter and postal cards.

Second. Newspapers and periodical publications.

Third. Miscellaneous printed matter, including books.

Prior to 1851 the Post-Office Department was self-sustaining. In 1881, 1882, and 1883, it was more than self-sustaining. Since that time, by reason of radical reductions in postal rates, it has not been quite self-sustaining.

In 1885 there were nine States in which there was an excess of receipts over expenditures. These States are:

	Excess.
Connecticut	$92,181
Delaware	4,392
Illinois	201,969
Massachusetts	832,589
New Hampshire	12,145
New Jersey	91,082
New York	1,976,960
Pennsylvania	370,194
Rhode Island	106,460

The Post-Office Department is emphatically the people's department. By their voluntary contributions they have maintained and supported it. From time to time as their necessities and convenience demanded has it been enlarged in its scope until under wise and careful management it has become a magnificent blessing, felt and appreciated in every town and hamlet throughout the length and breadth of our land.

The telegraph, telephone, and express, because of expense, are in their uses largely confined to the well-to-do classes, but all, the poor, the rich, the high, the low, the learned and the unlearned, are stockholders in and joint owners of this grand and vast Post-Office Department of our Government.

Needless extravagance will not be countenanced or approved, but a parsimonious spirit that tends in the least to impair the efficiency of this Department will meet with the severest condemnation. The agents of the people charged with the duty of legislation upon this subject will be severely condemned for withholding appropriations or legislation that are necessary and just in maintaining the efficiency of this vast people's system.

I desire to call the attention of this House especially to one branch of this postal Department. The railway postal clerk is the most important factor in this vast machine. The magnitude, accuracy, and importance of the work performed by the postal clerk is not generally known or appreciated. In 1851 the mail was only carried on 8,255 miles of railroad in the United States, and the whole number of clerks employed in the railway mail service, including the service on steamboats, was 148; but at the close of the fiscal year June 30, 1885, the mail was carried on 121,032 miles of road, and December 31, 1885, there were 4,512 clerks in the service. These 4,512 clerks handled during the year 4,964,673,577 pieces, including letters, cards, papers, registered packages, and pouches.

At least two persons were interested in each one of those pieces, the sender and the person to whom sent—interested in the speedy and safe delivery in good order of each and every one of these pieces. Each clerk during the year handled 1,249,760 pieces, or an average of 3,424 daily for every day in the year, including Sunday; for the postal clerk is not permitted to know any Sunday. While you are sitting in your cushioned pew listening to the charming theology of this day and age, the postal clerk is handling his 3,424 pieces of mail matter, so that before you return to church for the evening service you can spend a couple of hours in the pleasant recreation of opening and assorting from thirty to fifty letters from your constituents. To finish his daily task he must handle on an average three pieces per minute during every minute of every hour of the twenty-four.

But these clerks do more than this. They handle all kinds of packages, decipher all kinds of chirography, and with wonderful memory and almost unerring judgment, formed in the twinkling of an eye, determine when and by route each package should go, so as to reach its destination in the shortest possible time. They do this in the swaying car, speeding over the iron path at the rate of 40 miles an hour. They tie up the letters and cards for each point on the route, in packages, keep a faithful record of each and every registered letter or package, place the mail for each station in pouches, lock them up, throw them off, and take on others.

The magnitude of the work staggers human thought, and the credulous man cries out "impossible;" and yet the records of the Post-Office Department verify the daily performance of the seemingly impossible task.

The average annual run of each clerk is 40,167 miles, or a daily average of 110 miles for every day of the three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. If a letter is mailed in Portland, Me., destined for Portland, Oreg., the deft fingers of these skillful agents guide the inanimate missive from train to train and from road to road, so that the most experienced and well-posted traveler, starting at the same time, destined to the same point, can not get ahead of it. The one knocks at the post-office door in Portland, Oreg., and is delivered by the carrier to the person addressed, often before the other can get his name on the hotel register.

The value or importance of the letter or package is immaterial. The message of love from the humblest home nestles in the same package side by side with the one containing a draft or a money-order. The letter of a Gould or a Vanderbilt speeds on its way with no more celerity or certainty than does the message from the lowly thatched cottage where poverty abides. The blurred and blotted scrawl upon the postal card asking for garden-seeds finds out the poor Congressman just as rapidly and as surely as the tinted and perfumed sheet of the office-seeker, clad in its costly and aristocratic robe, finds its way to the mansion at the other end of the Avenue. I desire now to call your attention to the latest expression of Congressional wisdom in the interest of these postal clerks. It is the law approved July 31, 1882, entitled "An act to designate, classify, and fix the salaries of persons in the railway mail service," and is in the following terms:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That persons in the railway mail service, known as railway post-office clerks, route agents, local agents, and mail-route messengers, shall, on and after the passage of this act, be designated as railway postal clerks, and divided into five classes, whose salaries shall not exceed the following rates per annum:

First class, not exceeding $800; second class, not exceeding $900; third class, not exceeding $1,000; fourth class, not exceeding $1,200; and fifth class, not exceeding $1,400: Provided, That the Postmaster-General, in fixing the salaries of clerks in the different classes, may fix different salaries for clerks of the same class, according to the amount of work done and the responsibility incurred by each, but shall not in any case allow a higher salary to any clerk of any class than the maximum fixed by this act for the class to which such clerk belongs.

SEC. 2. That the sums appropriated in the act entitled "An act making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, and for other purposes," approved May 4, 1882, for the compensation of the railway post-office clerks, route agents, mail-route messengers, and local agents, be consolidated into one fund, and applied for the compensation of the clerks embraced in the five classes under the title of railway postal clerks provided in this act.

This act, as you will notice, divides these postal clerks into five classes, and fixes the maximum salaries of those in each class.

That those of the first class are not regarded as first-class clerks is evident from the fact that under this law they receive the least compensation.

The maximum pay, as fixed by this law, is as follows: first class, $800; second class, $900; third class, $1,000; fourth class, $1,200; fifth class, $1,400.

I will refer, therefore, reversing the order, first to the fifth-class clerks, who are entitled under the law to a maximum salary of $1,400 a year. In this class of clerks there were on December 31, 1885, seventy-two who receive a maximum salary of $1,400; and five hundred and sixty-four who receive a compensation of $1,300. I have some figures here from the report of the Department as late as the date mentioned, that is, 31st of December, 1885, showing how they are employed.

Of these seventy-two clerks, forty-eight are detailed as chief clerks. I should perhaps state by way of preliminary explanation in relation to these, that there is connected with the service, a general superintendent, who has his office in the Post-Office building in the city of Washington. Then there are nine division superintendents, who are stationed at different points throughout the United States, as, for instance, one at Atlanta, Ga.; one at Chicago, Ill.; one in New York city, one in Cleveland, Ohio; one in Washington, D. C.; one in San Francisco, Cal.; one in Boston, Mass., and one in Cincinnati, Ohio. The United States is divided into nine divisions, each division having a superintendent, and each superintendent having exclusive charge of a certain territory.

At various railroad centers in these divisions a postal clerk of the fifth class is detailed as chief clerk, who has immediate control and supervision of the postal routes terminating there; as, for instance, a postal clerk is detailed as chief clerk to take charge of the routes at Kansas City, Mo.; another at Omaha, Nebr.; one at Columbus, Ohio, and at Indianapolis, Ind., and at Harrisburg and Philadelphia, Pa., so that forty-eight out of the seventy-two clerks of this class are detailed as chief clerks in the various railroad centers.

Now, mark that this position of chief clerk is practically the highest promotion that is open to the postal clerk or to which he can hope to attain. Notice then how grandly and magnificently liberal the Government of the United States is to this class of its employés. They must, of necessity—and I am speaking of the chief clerks now—they must of necessity travel a great deal throughout the districts or divisions assigned to them, which frequently cover a large territory, in the interests of the service, and which necessarily takes them at times, hundreds of miles from their homes; and all their expenditures are met by themselves. For all of the expenses to which they are put in traveling for the United States Government on such service not a cent is paid by the Government. So that the compensation of a chief clerk will depend necessarily upon the amount of expense to which he is subjected. His compensation is frequently reduced to $1,000 per annum by reason of such expenditures; and hence the postal clerk who, by diligence, skill, and attention to his business, reaches this promotion has the unspeakable pleasure of taking all of the honor and responsibility and having his pay diminished instead of increased. What a marked incentive to skill, courtesy, and attention to the performance of duty is thus held out to him!

In the Indian appropriation bill just passed, I notice a provision for five Indian inspectors, who receive $3,000 per annum, and have appropriated, in addition to this amount, $8,000 for traveling expenses; Indian inspectors, who visit the various Indian agencies, not in the interest of the Government, not in the interest of the people, but ostensibly in the interest of poor Lo, the noble red man, the creation of the imagination of poets and philanthropists, but in fact, in the interest of the savage, treacherous, indolent, brutal, inhuman, barbarian, who will not work, who will not be civilized and who only becomes good after he ceases to be; Indian inspectors, who visit Indian agencies to look after the wholesomeness of the beef issued to these Ishmaelites, renew their breech-clouts, and prime their repeating rifles with fresh cartridges, with which to murder defensless women and children on the frontier; Indian inspectors, to see that treaties are observed, treaties that might as well have been made with the inmates of a lunatic asylum, or the vilest criminals within penitentiary walls; yet these men—and I condemn the system and not the men—are paid $3,000 per annum and traveling expenses, from money obtained from the people by legislative taxation. But the postal clerk, who travels in the interest of the people, in the interest of true civilization, in the interest of home and manhood and womanhood, receives at the most only $1,400 and pays his own traveling expenses.

I turn to page 178, of the report of the Attorney-General, and I read:

Limited ticket from Chicago to Washington, $26.50; cab, 75 cents; three meals on train at $1 each, $3; porter Pullman car, 25 cents; 'bus, Chicago, 50 cents; hotel bill, $7.50.

The postal clerk can sleep upon his mail-sacks on the floor of his postal car and sniff the perfumes from the eating houses on the road to keep body and soul together; but the slick lawyer's clerk who goes to take depositions rides on the limited express, sleeps in the Pullman car, the porter blacks his boots and brushes the dust from his clothes, the cab conveys him from the depot to the hotel, at which he devours viands to the amount of $7.50 per day, and all paid by the Government.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PETERS. Yes, sir; if you make it a short one.

Mr. TAULBEE. Have those postal clerks the right to resign, and let others take their places?

Mr. PETERS. Yes, they have.

Mr. TAULBEE. Then, why do not they?

Mr. PETERS. When you ask me that question you slap the very face of labor in this country.

Mr. TAULBEE. Will the gentleman allow me a further question?

Mr. PETERS. I have not time.

Mr. TAULBEE. I am satisfied you have not.

Mr. PETERS. Five hundred and sixty-four clerks of the fifth class receive $1,300. These are the men who have charge of cars, distribute the letters; are responsible for the mail, the car, the registered letters containing money; pay their own expenses, and receive only $1,300. They might under the law, and should under the law, receive the maximum salary, which is $1,400.

Clerks of class 4, 676, receive $1,150. They pay their own expenses. They might receive $1,200, the maximum salary, and should receive every cent of it.

Class 3, 1,603 clerks, receive $1,000. These pay their own expenses.

Class 2, 625 clerks, receive from $810 to $900; 575 receive $900.

Class 1, 699 clerks, receive $800; 273 receive sums ranging from $790 down to $1.

I have a table furnished by the superintendent of the service which I will read.

That furnishes food for the reformer, be his ideas of service civil or uncivil. The whining, growling cynic, who is always prating about the extravagance of the nation, will contemplate with evident relish the impecuniousness and meanness lavished upon this intelligent class of laboring men. The fathomless depth of this lavished meanness can not be fully appreciated without keeping in mind the fact, that the people who use the postal system, voluntarily contribute the money to pay for the service. It is not raised by hard or grinding taxation, but is the result of voluntary contributions. Here, then, is a wrong that should be remedied. The people have had good service and desire these agents to be justly and fairly treated and compensated. What, then, is the remedy? Part of it is to be found in the bill under consideration, by increasing the appropriations for fourth and fifth class clerks, so that they can receive the maximum salaries, and part must be furnished by other legislation.

I have said the maximum pay provided by law for a clerk of the fifth class is $1,400, and for a clerk of the fourth class is $1,200, and yet only 72 of the 636 clerks of the fifth class receive the maximum salary. Five hundred and sixty-four receive only $1,300. The 676 clerks of the fourth class receive $1,150 each per annum, or $50 less than the maximum salary. Why is this? Can any man give a reason that will be satisfactory to the fifty millions of patrons who support this service? The man who would dare assert, in the face of the recorded facts, that these men do not earn the maximum salaries would brand himself as an "innocuous" crank, wallowing in the sewer of prejudice or ignorance. These men should have the maximum salaries allowed by law.

The item in the appropriation bill for the pay of railway postal clerks should be increased $90,200; $56,400 for clerks of the fifth class, and $33,800 for clerks of the fourth class.

The other remedies, under our rules preventing legislation upon appropriation bills, can not be ingrafted on the bill under consideration except by unanimous consent, and as the age of miracles has passed away, unanimous consent can not be expected. These remedies are, first, to allow to all postal clerks when in actual service on their runs $1 per day for expenses. A man can not perform duty as a postal clerk and remain at home. From the time he starts on his run until he returns, often from two to five days being spent in making one run, he is necessarily bound to incur extra expenses. His meals alone, at the low rate of 25 cents each, would amount to 75 cents per day. Scarcely a run is made without the expense of a night's lodging. Then, he must furnish his own pens and ink, pencils, and stamp. All of these are small items, but in the aggregate during the year they amount to a considerable sum and very perceptibly reduce the net salary of the postal clerk. In addition to this, he is required to have a uniform for dress-parade and recognition. The dust and dirt incident to service upon the train destroy wearing apparel very rapidly, and hence it is almost essential that he have a second and a plainer suit in which to work in the car.

Every class of Government employés who are required to travel and are necessarily absent from their homes for stated periods, are allowed traveling expenses except these hard-worked and poorly paid railway postal clerks.

The second remedy must be secured by distinct legislation. I take this opportunity to call the attention of members to a certain bill and to ask their careful, unprejudiced consideration of its provisions.

On the 21st of December I introduced this bill, which I will now read:

A bill to pay dependent relatives of persons killed by accident engaged in the railway mail service, and to compensate for injuries received.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in case of the death of any employé in the railway mail service of the United States, caused by any accident while on duty, there shall be paid to the relative or relatives dependent upon such railway mail employé at the time of the accident a sum equal to two years' pay of the grade held at the time of death.

SEC. 2. That any employé of the railway mail service who may become disabled while on duty shall be paid four-fifths of the salary of the grade held by him at the time of the injury, during the continuance of the disability.

Neither the rich man nor the rich man's son seeks the position of a postal clerk. The work is too severe and the pay too meager. The position is one requiring great physical endurance, quick perception, good memory, at least a common-school education, and a strict attention to study and to duty. A drone or a dullard can not keep up with the requirements of the service. The degree of perfection required is remarkable. By a system of checking errors, a strict adherence to which is required by rigid rules, the penalty for the violation of which is dismissal from the service, errors are reported and charged up to each clerk. I have before stated that each clerk handles annually 1,249,760 pieces, or an average of 3,424 pieces per day. The record of errors for the past fiscal year shows an average of only one error per day for each clerk. Each clerk is required to pass a test examination at least twice a year. The clerk who fails to pass a satisfactory examination or who makes an unusual number of errors when out on his run, loses his position. The "lay-off" of the clerk, then, must largely be spent in studying the different schemes and connections. In short, when not actually running he must be preparing to run. He has, therefore, no time to devote to anything else except the duties incident to his position. His whole dependence for support for himself and family is upon his meager and hard-earned salary. With this, by strict economy, he can live comfortably and keep those dependent upon him, but—and I call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TAULBEE] to this—he can make no provision for them should accident befall him.

Mr. TAULBEE. Since the gentleman has alluded to me, I ask him to yield for a question.

Mr. PETERS. If you make it short. I have promised time to other gentlemen, and I have not the time to spare.

Mr. TAULBEE. I will make it short. I understood you to say that as railway postal clerks these were efficient business men, but that in that vocation they were unable to lay up any money. Now the question is, would they be able to lay up any money in any other vocation?

Mr. PETERS. If the gentleman had ever given any attention to the railway postal service, if he had ever been in a postal car, he would have seen that which would have made his question unnecessary; he would have seen that the time of the postal clerk is so fully occupied with his duties that he has no time for anything else, and is in a measure disqualified for any other occupation.

Mr. TAULBEE. What I meant by my question was to inquire whether or not the postal clerk could embark in some other business, and by that business be able to lay up money.

Mr. PETERS. I do not consider that a question which I need stop to answer.

To resume: The position of railway postal clerk is one of constant danger while out on his rnn. The mail trains are usually fast trains. The postal car is usually next to the engine. The clerk is engaged in his duties. He has no time to look out for danger and leap for his life in case of collisions. To show the danger let the record, as furnished in the report of the superintendent, speak:

Total number of casualties during last fiscal year	102
Number of clerks killed	2
Number seriously injured	35
Number slightly injured	65

The past year has been exceptionally free from casualties. In 1884, 7 clerks were killed in railroad accidents. Twenty-nine postal clerks have been killed in railroad accidents in the last ten years, and 182 seriously injured.

These risks are taken because the nature of the service requires it. They are taken in the interests of the people, and the people are willing to make a suitable and reasonable provision for the dependent ones in case the father or husband or son loses his life in their service. Do you raise the warning hand and cry, "Civil pension?" I say, away with such an impecunious specter. It can have no application to this proposed provision. It has no terrors for me, even though it should assume the fleshy personnel of the canting reformer. To do right never establishes a dangerous precedent.

Republics may be ungrateful; the people are not.

Republics may be impecunious; the people are liberal. Republics may be unjust; but the people when apprised of the act will condemn and remedy the wrong.

This postal service is the people's service. Public opinion, slowly compressing truth and expelling error, moves on in its grand march to the goal of a correct judgment as unerringly as day follows the night.

It is but a simple act of justice to say to these postal clerks "perform this dangerous yet necessary service for us, and should you lose life, we will see that those you love, do not suffer for the necessaries of life by the sudden bereavement. Public opinion will place the signet of its approval upon such a humane and just provision.

Do you say that if the present force do not desire to serve under the present law let them retire, and others will take their places? I repeat again, such an argument against the men in this service is a slap in the very face of labor.

All over our broad land, rich and grand as it is, is to be heard the voice of discontented labor pleading for recognition as an equal factor in the progress of the century. It is neither wisdom nor statesmanship to wait until necessity changes the prayer into a demand.

These postal agents represent a class of skilled labor that can not be acquired in a day. Their positions may be filled, but their work can not be effectively done by unskillful and untrained hands. This is the opportune moment for the great Government of the United States to give to capital a good example and to labor a merited recognition. The individual conscience will approve the act. From every hearthstone of American homes, from every mart of business, from every office, and from every shop, from every forge and from every field, from every city and from every hamlet, from every mine and from every mountain-top, from gulf to lake and from ocean to ocean, will come the signs and words of the nation's approval.

Let us be just and fear not. [Applause.]

Mr. MILLARD addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. RIGGS. Mr. Chairman, there are only two points upon which there is any difference of opinion in the committee on this appropriation bill, one in relation to the amount provided for pay of the railway postal clerks of the fourth and fifth classes, and the other with reference to the amount provided for the foreign mail service. I do not care to spend time on the first of the two points of difference.

On the first question, however, I want to say that I have an opinion which I am willing to express. I do not think that the amount provided by the committee for paying these railway postal clerks ought to be increased. I believe they are receiving pay enough.

The maximum pay which might be allowed these two under the law, $1,200 and $1,400 respectively, was in former years received by them; but several years ago that pay was reduced $50 per annum on each individual salary of each class, and reduced, too, at a time when the amount of pay they were then receiving would pay for less of the necessaries of life than what they are receiving at present will pay for now. I do not see any reason why the pay of these clerks should be put back to the old or maximum rate; but about that I do not care to talk further.

With reference to the provision for the transportation of foreign mails, it is understood, of course, that the committee could only provide for sea postage for all our outward mails carried by foreign vessels, and the same for all carried by sailing vessels, and sea and inland postage for those carried by steamships of American register. Beyond that the committee could not go, under the rules of the House and the provisions of the statutes. Now, if we have provided that, and if it can be shown that we have done so, all controversy ought to cease. I am not going to occupy any time here discussing the question whether or not all American ships ought to have the sea and inland postage, or whether some ought to have more than that.

This committee under the rules of the House can not provide more than the sea postage for foreign steamships and sailing vessels and sea and inland postage for steamships of American register, and it would be idle to discuss that question now. I believe it can be shown that the appropriations provided in the bill will be sufficient to pay the sea and inland postage wherever it ought to be paid. The following is the estimate made by the Department for the whole service for the fiscal year for which we are providing:

For the transportation of mails, including railway transit across the Isthmus of Panama, calculated at the rate heretofore paid for said service	$350,000 00
For balance due foreign countries, including the United States' portion of the expenses of the international bureau of the Universal Postal Union and the subscription of the Department for the monthly journal (L'Unjon Postale) of that bureau	100,000 00
Total	450,000 00

But this only covers sea postage for the whole foreign service, and the Superintendent of the Foreign Mail Service accompanies this estimate with the following:

If it is the will of Congress that the entire sea and inland postage shall be given to vessels of United States register for the conveyance of mails transported by them, the estimate of $350,000 must be increased $75,000, as you will observe by reference to the table herewith transmitted, which gives the weight of the mails conveyed by vessels of United States register for the fiscal year of 1885, and shows the total sea and inland postage thereon to be $81,679.67.

Deducting the amount of sea postage that was actually paid to said vessels, namely, $32,294.97, we have a balance of $49,384.70, that would have been paid if said vessels had been allowed both the sea and inland postage.

Under the same percentage of increase in the weight of mails as is estimated in this statement it will require $75,000 in addition to the appropriation of $350,000, making a grand total of $525,000 needed by the foreign mail service of this Department for the fiscal year to end June 30, 1887.

But this estimate needs revision, and has received it at the hands of the Superintendent of this branch of the service since his annual report was published.

At the time that estimate was made the service from Key West to Cuba was conducted under the direction of the Bureau of Foreign Mails, and pay therefor was included in that estimate. Since then arrangements have been contemplated, and I am told at the Department will no doubt be carried out, to transfer that service for the next fiscal year to a division or bureau of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General's Office. In that event it will be paid for out of the appropriation for the steamboat service, and thereby this estimate of $75,000 would be reduced by the sum of $13,000, as I am told at the Department. I believe that is about correct.

In addition to that deduction there is another which results from, I suppose, an oversight in making the estimates for inland postage to all steamships of American register in 1885, and that year is taken as the basis. The calculation was made on seventy-eight ships in American lines, and there is a table given here which shows that there are seventy-eight ships in American lines. But as a matter of fact fourteen of those vessels have foreign register, and can only be paid under the statutes sea postage, and on that account a deduction should be made. I have made an estimate and submitted it to the Superintendent of Foreign Mails and taken his judgment on it, and believe it is not too high as to what that deduction should be. I deduct, as I understand it, the inland postage, which must have been included in the estimate for fourteen ships of foreign register, the sum of $8,863.82. I believe the Superintendent of Foreign Mails is of the opinion that the sum of $13,500 should be deducted for that, which would be more favorable to the committee, but the computation which I made puts it at $8,863.82.

Then the sea and inland postage upon the mails from San Francisco to New Zealand and the Australian colonies, it is estimated, for the fiscal year 1887 would amount to about $41,000. New Zealand and the Australian colonies have a contract with an American line to carry mails both ways, and have entered into an arrangement which may be extended for three years at the option of our Government, under which we pay New Zealand and the Australian colonies $20,000 per annum, and they guarantee the conveyance of our outward mails. So there is a saving of $21,000.

Gentlemen may say it is a niggardly and perhaps a very unwise policy so to treat our own vessels that they must go and contract with other powers, and then we make a contract for what may be regarded as a very low price with those powers. I know that may be said, but we have made an arrangement of that kind. We have already provided for the carriage of those mails for the next fiscal year at a saving on sea and inland postage of $21,000.

Now, putting those sums together, they make a total of $42,863.82, which, deducted from the $75,000 estimated, would still leave something like $33,000, or between thirty-two and thirty-three thousand dollars. But here is an item which should be taken into account. The inland postage for all these ships, the fourteen of foreign register and those of American register in 1885, was only $49,384.70. Deducting the $8,863 on account of the fourteen vessels included that are of foreign register, there is left but a little over $40,000 for inland postage for all steamships of American register. That was in 1885.

The average increase in the foreign-mail service for six years has been 5 per cent. per annum. There was an actual decrease in 1885, as compared with 1884, of $317.18 in the foreign-mail service. Taking the average rate of increase for six years last past, 5 per cent., add that to the $40,000 which would have been necessary in 1885 to pay full inland postage to vessels of American register, and you would have $42,000 for this current fiscal year. Five per cent. added to that would make about $44,100. It would probably run up to nearly $45,000 actually for the fiscal year 1887. The difference between this sum and the $75,000 originally estimated by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails is $30,000, which sum, less the $8,863.82 already deducted on account of the fourteen vessels of foreign register, should be deducted from the original estimate of $75,000. The result produced by this calculation is as follows:

Original estimate for inland postage		$75,000 00
Deduct for fourteen vessels named	$8,863 82
Deduct for Cuban service	8,000 00
Deduct for New Zealand and Australian services	21,000 00
Deduct for overestimate on increase	21,136 18
		59,000 00
Leaving as the balance necessary		16,000 00

The committee have provided $25,000, which, upon the foregoing calculation, will be more than sufficient.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we may get at the matter in another way. Take the whole cost of the foreign-mail service for the first half of the present fiscal year, which is $171,733.37, and this includes the Cuban service, and sea and inland postage to steamship San Pablo, of the Occidental and Oriental line, and to the United States and Brazil line, and the American line from Philadelphia to Great Britain.

1886, first half year	$171,733 37
Cost of whole year, 1886	343,466 74
Deduct for Cuban mail service	13,000 00
	330,466 74
Add 5 per cent. for increase	16,523 33
Estimate for 1887	346,990 07
To which must be added inland postage to a portion of the American lines not included in the above estimate, and deducting the above estimate from the amount we provide for the whole service	375,000 00
Leaving to pay inland postage to balance of American lines, which sum will be sufficient	28,009 93

Thus it is seen that an error in the estimates, a change in the facts and an arrangement made (I believe it was made in November, which was after the estimates were made at the Department) in regard to our mails to New Zealand and the Australian colonies, have so changed the situation that $50,000 of the $75,000 estimated by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails is absolutely not necessary.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I occupied?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed twenty-three minutes, counting the time he gave away.

Mr. RIGGS. I now yield twenty minutes of my time to my colleague on the subcommittee [Mr. WAKEFIELD], and after he has occupied that I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. WAKEFIELD. I shall not enter upon any elaborate discussion of the bill under consideration. My time would not permit did inclination lead me to do so. Neither do I purpose to be led into any political discussion in connection with this measure. So far as the general scope and terms of the bill are concerned I feel certain they will, from all fair and intelligent judgment, compel the concession that in the main its provisions are liberal without extravagance, and economical without parsimony.

I have warrant, I think, for asserting that the committee having the bill in charge—ably counseled and sustained by its distinguished chairman—has sought by careful and earnest investigation to arrive at such conclusions as, while keeping steadily in view the needs of an important and rapidly increasing branch of the public service, might not on the one hand subject them to the just criticism of a reckless appropriation of the public money, or on the other to an indefensible attempt to curtail necessary expenses to the embarrassment of a service whose efficiency is intimately identified with all the social and business interests of our people.

If the conclusions we have reached shall fail of accord, either in whole or in part, with the judgment of the House, it will not be because of our failure to thoroughly and critically examine the estimates, appropriations, and expenditures of previous years, or any hesitation while regarding the wonderful development of our postal system to increase or reduce the appropriations as seemed to be indicated by the exigencies of the service. Wherever a reduction of the estimates of the Postmaster-General has been resorted to it has been justified to the committee by a full comparison of the estimates and expenditures of many previous years.

But, as I remarked at the outset, I did not rise to discuss the merits of the bill as an entirety. I wish simply, within the limits of the time allotted me, to state as briefly as I may the reasons that compel me to withhold my assent to the proposition of my distinguished friend from Michigan. He desires to add $50,000 to the amount believed by a very large majority of the Post-Office Committee sufficient to secure a satisfactory carriage of our foreign mails. While I had learned to admire the ability of the gentleman from Michigan long before I had the honor of his acquaintance, and while I have for his opinions ordinarily the most profound respect, I can not follow him into what seems to me an unnecessary expenditure, and, so far as I can perceive, one by no means demanded by any present needs of that special service.

My friend has embodied his views of this proposition in an able and exhaustive minority report, submitted by him some days since, on House bill No. 4864, introduced here by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RIGGS], which provides as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That all vessels owned by citizens of the United States and the masters thereof, bound from any port therein to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port in the United States, shall, before clearance, receive on board all such mails as the Post-Office Department of the United States, or any minister, consul, or commercial agent of the United States abroad shall offer for transportation, and shall securely convey and promptly deliver the same to the proper authorities on arriving at the port of destination, and shall receive for such service such compensation as may be allowed by law therefor, or by the Post-Office Department in pursuance of any law of Congress; and upon the entry of every such vessel returning from any foreign port, the master thereof shall make oath that he has promptly delivered all the mails placed on said vessel before clearance for the United States; and in case of any violation hereof such vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel of the United States.

Since it seemed necessary for purposes of illustration that he should quote somewhat from that report, I find myself compelled to follow his example, and shall do so so far as my argument may require.

Now, I quite agree with my learned friend that the question of how much and what compensation shall be allowed by the Postmaster-General under that clause in Mr. RIGGS'S bill which stipulates that the ships carrying the United States mails "shall receive for such service such compensation as may be allowed by law, or by the Post-Office Department in pursuance of any law of Congress," must be determined, as the law now stands, by sections 4007 and 4009 of the Revised Statutes.

These sections are as follows:

SEC. 4007. The Postmaster-General may, after advertising for proposals, enter into any contract for the transportation of the mail between the United States and any foreign country whenever the public interests will thereby be promoted.

SEC. 4009. For transporting the mail between the United States and any foreign port, or between ports of the United States touching at a foreign port, the Postmaster-General may allow as compensation, if by a United States steamship, any sum not exceeding the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign steamship, or by a sailing vessel, any sum not exceeding the sea postage on the mail so transported.

There can be no dispute on the point that has been made, that the utmost limit of the discretion of the Postmaster-General in fixing the compensation to the American carriers of our foreign mails reaches no step beyond the payment of sea and inland postage.

From this point, however, the opinions of the majority and minority of the Post-Office Committee diverge, and diverge widely. I assume that the opinion of this committee and of the House is, without exception, in favor of paying our mail steamers a just and reasonable compensation for services rendered. This great Government can not afford to compel or accept the valuable service of corporations or individuals without making adequate and just remuneration for the same.

The primal question then, or indeed the only question of moment suggested by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, is this, i. e., Is the Postmaster-General authorized by present law to pay to steamers carrying our mails a fair and adequate compensation? Or, to put it in another form, Is the sea and sea and inland postage a reasonable and just compensation for that service?

I have examined somewhat carefully the report of the present Postmaster-General, and have endeavored from such sources as were available to obtain the data that would aid in measuring the actual labor devolving upon the owners of these mail steamers in the handling and transportation of the mails, and I have been convinced, both by speech and by silence, that as an element to determine to any appreciable extent the value of these services it is without force or importance, the transfer of the mails by wagon from the New York post-office to the vessel, the delivery of the same at the port to which they sail by similar conveyance, the stowage of the mail in a small, unlighted room on board the vessel while in transit, requiring less care and attention than is bestowed upon the baggage of the passengers.

This constitutes the sum of the labor and expense, so far as I have been able to get information, for which our American lines are insisting they are entitled to pay far in excess of what they can receive under the present law.

One subject connected with this foreign-mail service was either studiously or carelessly ignored by the representatives of the lines that had a hearing by the Post-Office Committee, and that was the special privileges and benefits accruing to these steamers in foreign ports, and founded solely upon their character as transporters of the public mails. Neither did any of those gentlemen enlighten us in respect to the munificent money benefactions received from those countries whose mails form the objects of their solicitude and care when returning to the home ports. The figures which I shall exhibit later on, joined with this seeming attempt to put aside or obscure important facts, have forced me to the conclusion that an efficient and satisfactory sea-service can be secured by the payment only of sea, and in some instances of sea and inland, postage.

In reaching this conclusion I have omitted any consideration of patriotism and pride of country—to which, with some rhetorical fervor, allusion was made in the report referred to—that might perhaps be expected to animate the breasts of ship-owners as vigorously as those of any other class of our citizens. A sentiment so worthy and exalted should not be confined to the charmed circle of those who pay, since those who are paid have greater practical reasons for its manifestation. Whatever may be the fact as to the wisdom, or otherwise, of an attempt to build up and develop our merchant marine by blindly accepting the theories and following the example of the great European powers, I feel confident it should not be attempted through the instrumentality that has been here invoked to that end. If that question must come before Congress, let it present itself, or be presented, without subterfuge or disguise. Its weight and importance forbid that it should seek a temporary triumph by any indirection.

Let us meet it, if meet it we must, frankly, squarely upon the naked proposition to grant directly for that purpose, and that purpose only, from the national Treasury whatever amount by way of largess or subsidy may be demonstrated to be needed to induce capital to build us ships and undertake the venture of the seas. Do not expect, however, that you can accomplish this by adding a few thousand dollars to the Post-Office budget.

Before presenting the figures that affect this question of adequate compensation to mail steamers, I beg the indulgence of the committee while I state some of the special privileges and benefits that mail steamers receive at their various ports of destination.

In response to inquiries addressed to a number of foreign countries by the Superintendent of Foreign Mails for information as to what privileges and immunities were granted by them to vessels carrying the mails to and from their respective countries the following replies were received:

The Japanese office states that no privileges are granted to mail steamers other than that provided for in article 4 of the regulations of trade between the United States and Japan, namely: Steamers conveying the mail of the United States may enter and clear on the same day, and they are not required to make a manifest, except for such passengers and goods as are to be landed in Japan.

The Havana office states that mail steamers making periodical voyages to Cuba are exempted from the payment of any tax, provided they do not bring in or take out more than 6 tons of freight, and are charged only 62½ cents per ton for all excess over 6 tons; besides, custom-house permits are taken out before the arrival of the steamers, and such steamers are dispatched in preference to all others. All other than mail steamers are charged $1.35 per ton on all freight brought in or taken out.

The Bahama office says that mail steamers are exempted from all port charges and are liable only to pilotage fees. The steamer also saves 1 shilling (24 cents) per ton on her registered tonnage and 3 pence (6 cents) per ton for light dues.

The St. Thomas (Danish West Indies) office reports that under the law of April 16, 1882, steamers making regular voyages by which mails are conveyed are exempt from fees paid to the port and a moderation of the harbor-master's fees, and are allowed to arrive and depart out of time.

The Belize (British Honduras) office says that vessels by virtue of being mail steamers are exempted from the payment of any port dues, all other steamers being charged at the rate of 12½ cents per registered ton.

The Bogota (United States of Colombia) states require the payment of no tonnage dues from mail steamers which make regular trips.

In Venezuela the immunities accorded to steamers carrying the mails consist in extending the hours of labor in the custom-house and affording them special facilities in meeting the requirements of the custom-house regulations in loading and unloading cargoes.

In Brazil the mail steamers are allowed to unload their cargo immediately, preference being given them before any other vessel and before they have been entered at the custom-house, and this not only on ordinary week days, but also on Sundays and holidays. They are also permitted to sail at any hour of the day or night after they have taken on the mail, and they can not be detained in any Brazilian port, under any pretext whatever, beyond the hour fixed for sailing.

These privileges seem to be an adequate compensation for the labor and expense of transferring the mails to and from the ship at the several ports. And, too, it must be remembered that a very large proportion of the letter mail carried by these steamers to the South American ports consists of the advices of consignors in New York to their consignees, covering manifests and bills of lading, important to both and for the exclusive benefit of the steamer's patrons.

A comparison has been made in the minority report between the rates of compensation paid to railroads, star routes, and coastwise and domestic steamboat lines and that paid steamers carrying our foreign mails, and the argument is advanced and insisted on that great inequality exists between these classes of service by reason of an alleged unwarrantable discrimination against the foreign steamship lines.

The apothegm is a quaint but old one that "figures won't lie." They may, however, be so unfortunately combined as to fail in expressing the true status of the problem they are invoked to solve.

In the tabulated statement embodied in the report of the minority the rate per mile of railroad compensation is placed at 10.95 cents; that of star route at 6.52 cents, and of domestic steamers at 15.9 cents. The further statement is appended that ships carrying foreign mails receive but 2.74 cents per mile. While these figures, if strictly accurate, might prove that the rate paid to our railroads is excessive; and while it is perhaps true that we are paying the railroads a rate which, contrasted with the compensation for star-route service, is greatly disproportionate to the cost, yet the error has been made by the gentleman representing the minority of basing his rate to foreign steamers upon a mistaken estimate of service mileage.

The truth is, and it is one not to be lost sight of in this calculation, that these steamers and occasional vessels carrying our mails are paid only for their outward-bound trips.

The tabulated statement that I have here, prepared with great care in the office of the Superintendent of Foreign Mails, enables me to correct the statement in the report. I will not weary the committee with giving the figures in detail. I shall ask to have it printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks. These tables show that the total number of miles traveled on outward trips by the eight principal lines which carried the mails—and this includes those that united in a refusal to carry—was 810,829 miles; the total amount paid them was $43,492.48, or an average per mile of 5.3 cents. Contrast this with the 6.52 cents paid on star routes, and consider the different character of the two methods of service, and it is evident that these common carriers by sea receive full compensation for their services.

But in discussing the adequacy and justice of sea and inland postage as the rate of compensation, it is not fair or accurate to place the compensation of foreign steamers at the rate stated. Had the lines mentioned been paid both sea and inland postage, they would, as will be seen in this table, have received 14.4 cents per mile for every mile they carried the American mails.

This rate exceeds that paid to railroads by nearly 3½ cents, and is but a trifle more than 1 cent less than that paid domestic steamboat lines.

These steamers and other vessels on their return trips carry mails for other countries and not for ours, and, as this table further exhibits, they are subsidized by those countries to a large extent in many cases, and hence their average pay for their return mail service amounts to about 59 cents per mile.

The glaring inequality spoken of in the minority report, which is revealed by a comparison of compensations allowed foreign mail ships and those employed in the coastwise service, is found after all, upon inspection of the facts and their surroundings, to present no alarming or surprising features. There are but few coastwise steamers to-day in the mail service. They are passing out of use, and must soon give way entirely to other, safer, and less expensive means of carriage. Where these lines still exist, they do so to meet a pressing demand for mail facilities that would not be supplied did not the Government step in and at any unavoidable and necessary cost secure to the poorest and weakest of its citizens this essential adjunct to civilization.

This is done in pursuance of the well-established policy of the Government, which recognizes, as it ought to recognize, the right of every citizen of the Republic, however isolated and remote from its great business centers, to some safe and certain means of communication with the great world of which he is a part. It is this policy which adds so largely to the cost of the star-route service, and yet I think there are few gentlemen in the House, certainly very few from the South or West, who would advocate change in this policy affecting the last-named service.

It is, therefore, hardly ingenuous to compare these two classes of service with that rendered by the steamers carrying our foreign mails in order to make out a case of "gross inequality," since these latter lines are established and are maintained primarily and solely as common carriers of passengers and freight. This is evidenced by the fact that with or without mails they continue to pursue their occupation with the same regularity and frequency of voyage.

Another fact of which I have heard little mention should be considered in connection with this proposed comparison; that is, that all the steamboat lines, the coastwise steamship lines, and star routes are under special contracts, by which they are compelled to render service at stated times, to make regular trips, and obligated to make such trips whether they have or have not anything but the mails to carry. If they fail in any of the particulars of their contracts, they are mulcted in a considerable amount, which in the life of the agreement often operates to lessen very materially their aggregate compensation. The lines between Portland and Eastport, Me.; between New Bedford and Edgartown, Mass.; between Key West and Biscayne, Fla., and between Apalachicola and Carabella, Fla., received less than 10 cents per mile, or more than 4 cents less than sea and inland postage applied to foreign carriage.

There are now under contract, as I am informed by the Post-Office Department, but six lines on which a greater rate is paid per mile than would be paid to steamers carrying foreign mails on the basis of sea and inland postage.

It is true that the Government pays for carrying the mails from Port Townsend, Wash., to Sitka, Alaska, what appears on the surface to be a vastly disproportioned sum when contrasted with the rates allowed the Pacific Mail between New York and Aspinwall, or between San Francisco and China, or that paid to the line between New York and Venezuela; but it must be remembered that while the former line is executing a special contract, compelled to sail at fixed periods and conform its schedule of time to the demands of the Government, the latter are depending almost entirely upon their freight and passenger traffic for their profits, and go and come at their own pleasure.

It has been claimed that the reduction in the rate of sea postage by the Postal Union caused a great diminution of the total compensation received by these companies. Is this true? It appears from tables furnished our committee of the rates of postage on foreign matter chargeable during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1868, the total sea and inland postage amounted on all the mail carried to West Indies, South America, and on the Pacific to about $72,359.49; while during the fiscal year 1885, at the rate of sea and inland postage governed by the limitation of the Paris convention, the total amount at the actual average rate of three letters per ounce was $106,718.64.

From 1874 to 1885 there was a gain of $42,000 and over on sea and inland postage paid to steamers carrying the mails to West Indies, South America, and Pacific seas.

There is no question that our mail service to-day is the most economical as well as the most efficient of that of any nation on the globe.

The British postal administration, after a recent thorough examination of our system and methods of trans-Atlantic service, were compelled to acknowledge that our advantages were far superior to their own. They employ but three lines, and these are heavily subsidized. As a consequence they can not avail themselves of competition, while we can engage the services of any line we choose and actually pay less to all lines than England pays to them.

But the plea is made that the compensation of our mail steamers should be largely increased in order that our commerce that now languishes may be fostered and revived. How this is to be accomplished—how we are to reach that happy condition of commercial supremacy, which is the aspiration of all intelligent Americans, by contributing to the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, carrying our mails to the South American ports and China, a few thousand dollars more than they have heretofore received, I confess has not been demonstrated with such clearness as to remove from my mind its doubts. I name the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for no purpose of antagonizing that enterprising corporation, but simply because it so occurs that in any bid for mail carriage under contract that company and its associated lines would find themselves without annoying competition. What we are endeavoring to accomplish by the appropriation asked for in the bill of the committee, if I correctly apprehend the purpose of the committee, is to secure a safe, speedy, regular, and economical transportation of our mails. That, I conceive, is the chief and only object we should keep in view in determining what can properly be appropriated to our foreign-mail service. If in pursuing this inquiry it shall happen that the commerce of the country shall incidentally receive encouragement and benefit by this service, well and good. No one will rejoice at such result more than I. But this, however desirable, should not become the principal and vital question in this discussion. It should not, I think, come at all to the front in determining as to the compensation and methods by which we hope to arrive at the best results in our foreign-mail system.

I do not deny that some legislative action is perhaps desirable and demanded by the people of the country in the direction of increasing and facilitating our business relations with foreign countries, and especially with South American states. The enlarging of our capacities and opportunities for a free interchange of our varied products with those of the great manufacturing and productive nations of the world is, I confess, a consummation devoutly to be wished.

But here arises the question, What best mode of reaching these desirable results is indicated by our present conditions? This is a question that has for many years engaged the attention and confounded the judgment of statesmen "the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to unloose."

I think we shall all agree that as respects foreign commerce our flag has been too long in a deplorable condition of "innocuous desuetude."

Our Navy, and our foreign merchant marine as well, have, like the comet of Ruskin, with changes of locality, too long been wagging their useless tails of phosphorescent nothing across the steadfast seas. The descent to Avernus has been easy. How may we mount again to the upper air? How are we to get back the traffic of the world? How are we to resume our position as one of the chief carriers of the world? The two questions last propounded were urged in the Forty-first Congress by that distinguished statesman and incorruptible patriot Hon. Z. Chandler, of Michigan, a State that has been, and is to-day, very ably represented in both branches of Congress, but never perhaps with more ability than on the occasion to which I refer.

Mr. Chandler, on the 25th of May, 1870, introduced in the Senate a resolution instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire and report as to the most feasible and effective method for restoring the foreign commerce of the United States to American vessels.

On the 28th of the same month the resolution came up in the Senate for consideration, and its able author proceeded to give to the Senate and the country the results of his investigations in that prolific field of speculation.

A perusal of his masterly and instructive presentation of the subject reveals the fact that with all his research and thoroughness of examination of the plans proposed he was finally unable to evolve any theory that to his own mind was entirely free from objections. With the permission of the committee I will read one or two short extracts from his speech:

> What is the cause of the great change? It is that there has been a revolution in commerce—a revolution as complete since the year 1860 as though a century had intervened. To-day all immigrants, all valuable freights, all profitable cargoes are shipped by steam-propellers. Iron has taken the place of wood, and steam the place of wind.
> The vessel-builder can see nothing in commerce but building ships; he thinks that if you stimulate the building of ships you are building up your commerce. Well, sir, you may build ten thousand ships, and if you can not run them profitably you have no commerce. They will lie and rot at your docks if they lose $5 a trip. The vessel-owners can see nothing of commerce but ship-owning. Well, sir, you may own ten thousand ships, and if you can not run them profitably you have no commerce. If they lose $5 a trip they will not run; they must make a profit. As I said before, the great question is, how shall we restore this commerce to our flag? Here we meet with almost insuperable obstacles.
> We might, by abrogating our present treaties with all the nations of the earth, impose differential duties between our own and all other flags, and that might be of benefit to our commerce. I see that a member of the other House has introduced a bill with that view. I already had that proposition among my notes; but, in my judgment, it would not lead to any material benefit, because every other nation would pass retaliatory laws. Spain has always pursued that course, as she does to-day. In the island of Cuba there is a differential duty imposed upon all foreign vessels; but we are not much disposed to follow the example of Spain; it is now rather late in the day for us to copy Spain, and still I am not sure but that we may be driven to that very course. I do not commit myself one way or the other.

One fact is especially observable in this connection, and that is that among the many methods occurring to Mr. Chandler as possessing more or less of merit it does not appear that one so unique as that which has been advanced in the minority report had ever for a single moment found lodgment in his mind. And this speech was made six years after he had, in the most formal manner, by a negative vote, emphasized his protest to such hazardous and unwise legislation.

As long ago as in 1864, on a bill authorizing the establishment of an ocean mail steamship service between the United States and Brazil, Mr. Chandler, with the prescience of an enlightened statesmanship, refused his assent to such a proposition, and his vote on its final passage in the Senate is recorded in the negative. That we could secure the exhibition of our flag on every sea and in every port of the world by contracting with certain steamship lines for the carriage of our mails at a figure not limited by the value of the service escaped, in some unaccountable manner, the favorable consideration of that eminent statesman from whose public utterances I have read, and who in every other respect seems to have exhausted the great field of inquiry upon which he entered.

Whatever may be the fact as to the desirability of subsidies for increasing the commerce of the United States with South America or other countries, I can not believe that our Post-Office Department should be charged with the duty of their distribution. Higher rates of compensation to existing carriers will in no wise increase the lines of vessels navigating to those countries.

If it shall be determined by this Congress that new lines should be established by Government aid, it should be done by other methods than those here proposed. But I do not believe this House will so decide. Our previous experience in this direction was not fraught with such results as to tempt us again into that unsatisfactory and unprofitable field of experiment. The years of subsidies, from 1862 to 1884, during which we paid for the transportation of the United States mails to Mexico, West Indies, Central and South America, to vessels carrying our flag, the sum of $3,210,321.48, were years of least efficiency and regularity of our foreign mail service.

If the lines now engaged in legitimate commercial carriage upon the sea are put to service at a reasonable compensation in the transporting of our mails, there will be no danger of failure and no apprehension that the service will not be well and faithfully rendered.

The committee will, I hope, pardon me that, in discussing the proposition at issue, I have perhaps strayed somewhat from the original text. It seemed unavoidable, from the nature of the amendment proposed, to consider the question of subsidies, since, as I think, the increase asked for by the gentleman from Michigan is a subsidy pure and simple, and one that is demanded by no consideration of the needs of the service and by no reasonable anticipations of its increased efficiency. In my judgment the true method is foreshadowed in the Riggs bill, now on the Calendar. Compel these lines of steamers which are protected and honored by our flag to take and transport our mails as there provided, and place upon the Postmaster-General the responsibility of seeing that a reasonable compensation—which I am convinced can be found within the limits of present enactments—be paid for the service they render. In my judgment all will then be done that is needed to give us a safe, speedy, and economical foreign mail service. Let the question of subsidies for the encouragement of our merchant marine and the fostering of our commerce with the South American and other states and colonies be considered as an independent proposition, and stand or fall upon its own intrinsic merits. Let us here and now consider only the best methods by which the social and business correspondence of our own and other countries can be accomplished without unnecessary delays and embarrassment.

NICHOLAS M. BELL, Superintendent Foreign Mails.

During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the following proceedings occurred:

When Mr. WAKEFIELD had spoken fifteen minutes the hammer fell.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WAKEFIELD. I now yield the remaining five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM].

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I believe that I am to be allowed ten minutes of this debate, and as the gentleman from Minnesota has just now yielded me five minutes, I will take my ten minutes later in the debate, and will now yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUENTHER].

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman, I concur in everything that was said on this side of the House with respect to the pay of railway mail clerks. I have, whenever the question was discussed in the Forty-seventh or Forty-eighth Congress, voted to increase the salaries of these hard-worked and poorly-paid employés of the Government. I am always in favor of paying fair and reasonable compensation for labor well performed. I have mainly, however, Mr. Chairman, taken the floor to reply to the gentleman from Michigan, who addressed the committee yesterday, and to the gentlemen from New York and Kansas, who have just spoken, on the question of the carrying of the foreign mails.

My distinguished friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS], as usual, made a strong and most eloquent speech yesterday. I cordially indorse all he said about the pay of the railway mail clerks and the civil-service law. I share his views regarding offensive partisanship as laid down by the Postmaster-General.

I fail, like him, to detect the so-much-talked-about Jeffersonian simplicity and honesty of the present administration. I think those two qualities, to use democratic simplicity of speech, have relapsed into a state of innocuous desuetude. I, like my friend, do not approve of the way removals are made and information regarding them withheld. I grant, Mr. Chairman, that this Democratic administration, the Postmaster-General included, has committed sins enough to relegate them to "innocuous" political desuetude at the next election, without charging them with acts of which I do not believe them guilty.

My friend said that the will of Congress in regard to the foreign mails, passed in the last hours of the Forty-eighth Congress, was entirely and totally nullified by the Postmaster-General. A great deal has been said, Mr. Chairman, in the newspapers of this country about this matter.

The Postmaster-General has been made the target for innumerable and vicious assaults and misrepresentations which, in my opinion, have been entirely unfounded and were dictated solely from a spirit of revenge and spite by certain steamship companies, and more especially one—the Pacific Mail Steamship Company—which, seeing their well-laid plans for a successful raid upon the Treasury of the United States frustrated by the Post-Office Department, set up a most terrific and prolonged howl, fit only to be compared to the mad roar of a blood-thirsty tiger whose prey has been suddenly snatched from him. They kept up the howl in their subsidized press with such persistency, that many well-meaning and patriotic persons really believed the charges they made. My friend read the act of March 3, 1885. It is as follows:

Office of Superintendent of Foreign Mails:

For transportation of foreign mails, including transit across the Isthmus of Panama, $800,000; and the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized to enter into contracts for the transportation of any part of said foreign mails, after legal advertisement, with the lowest responsible bidder, at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points: Provided, That the mails so contracted shall be carried on American steamships, and that the aggregate of such contracts shall not exceed one-half of the sum hereby appropriated.

He construes it that it left the Postmaster-General no discretion; that he had to advertise for bids, &c. Now, let us see what one of the most conspicuous advocates of this law said when it was up for debate in the last Congress. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 3, 1885:

Mr. HORR. * * * This bill simply says that the incoming Democratic Postmaster-General may make such contracts with American vessels for carrying our foreign mails as he may now make with our coastwise vessels for carrying the mails on the coast.

Mr. BINGHAM. For one year only.

Mr. HORR. For one year only.

Mr. MORSE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. MORSE. Does this apply to any particular line in this country now?

Mr. HORR. Certainly not.

Mr. MORSE. Then it is entirely optional with the Postmaster-General to use the appropriation or not as he may see proper.

Mr. HORR. Every dollar of it is left subject to his judgment. If he does not think the service demands that a contract should be made with any vessel or any route he need not make it.

And instead of my friend from Indiana arraigning Democrats here for voting on this thing, I say to you when you vote against this proposition you vote a lack of confidence in your own Postmaster-General, which does not come with good grace from you.

Mr. HOLMAN. Allow me to ask a question.

Mr. HORR. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was it not a subsidy to the Pacific Mail which lasted until 1882—a subsidy of $5,000,000?

Mr. HORR. What is the date?

Mr. HOLMAN. Begun in 1872 and ended in 1882. Was it not couched in the very same language as the proposition put by the Senate to this House?

That ought to dispose of the construction as given this law by my friend from Michigan.

Now, let us see what the Postmaster-General says. I read from his report (pages 35, 36, 37, and 38):

A statement, compiled in the Office of the Foreign Mails, shows the total miles sailed last year, and to have been expected to be sailed this year, by all American companies, to be over 2,050,000; and the total compensation at the maximum rate would exceed $1,025,000, or over two and one-half times the utmost authorized expenditure. The act requires a letting to the lowest responsible bidder after legal advertisement to invite competition; and except to contractors, so brought into service, no money could be paid on mileage contracts. Only two routes are navigated by more than one American company; one between New York and Havana, the other between San Francisco and Japan and China. To have solicited competition by advertisement would have been idle, except upon these; no competition to bring the bids below the maximum rate was possible.

The consequence seems undeniable that the Department must either have made choice of certain routes whose total mileage would have demanded no more than the limited sum, and, by ostentatiously calling through advertisement for a competition which could not come, have distributed the whole bounty to the chosen, entirely excluding the others, or else have so planned its advertisements to meet the circumstances of the only possible bidders that, by concerted understanding with all American companies or such as the Department chose to give the money to, contracts might have been made for such sums to each that the whole appropriation would be divided between them.

The first method of expending the money would have been partial and unjust. There are no circumstances, it may be safely affirmed, which give any American line the right to be so greatly preferred that it should be paid the full bounty while others should receive none. And to have so administered the authority would have defeated the objects of the appropriation, since, it may well be supposed, the disfavored lines would promptly and justifiably have refused their further service as mail-carriers to the Government.

* * * * * * *

But the act unmistakably contemplated, by its terms, that the Government should secure the gain of competition, wherever possible, among bidders. The two routes already mentioned afforded the opportunity. Yet, if the law were pursued and a contract were awarded to either of the companies on the trans-Pacific route, and another to either of those plying between New York and Havana, both public injury and private injustice would have been wrought, because the public would have lost the service of one company on each route when it ought to enjoy the greater frequency of both, and one company on each would have been denied a share of the bounty to which it was as well entitled as the other. This constituted in itself so grave an objection to any employment of the authority of the act as to render it of doubtful expediency, a proof of which lies in the usages of the trans-Atlantic carriage, where the best service is gained by employing at will the swiftest ship among those ready to sail at any time when mail is to be dispatched, no special contracts being made.

To obviate this obstacle lying in the path of the second proposed plan the further suggestion came that two contracts should be made on each of these routes, one suited to the conveniences of each company, and the advertisements be accordingly framed to solicit proposals for stated sailings, such as were habitually made by these lines. Thus, between New York and Havana, as one company regularly sails on Thursday and the other on Saturday, one advertisement should invite proposals to contract for a Thursday departure, another for a Saturday.

In brief, without more particular mention of the details, the Department must have specially preconsidered all the peculiar features of the lines and business of each of the companies which would affect the contract or competition for it; must have carefully estimated the miles of sailing each would perform and the price per mile each might bid; must have received the concurrence of all in the scheme; and so arranging as to receive but one bid for each contract advertised for, and that one at the prearranged price per mile, or practically making the several contracts before the advertisements, might have distributed the appropriation among the American steamship companies ratably according to their mileage.

To warrant such a procedure this act must be read as directing the Department to distribute $400,000 among American steamship companies in return for their carrying the mails, in such manner as it might deem fairest between them, and most ingeniously evasive of its written purpose to secure competition and award the contract to the lowest bidder.

* * * * * * *

No stimulus to enterprise could have resulted; since, if any new American steamship were, during the year, put upon the sea—as has happened in fact—the Department could not have employed it as a mail-carrier in a similar manner, the whole bounty having been pre-engaged to the long-established lines.

* * * * * * *

The act puts at the disposal of the Department, in the ordinary terms of appropriation, the sum of $800,000 for transportation of the foreign mails, warranting thereby its entire expenditure, if necessary, under previously existing powers. The mere authority to make contracts on the mileage plan of compensation with American steamships is superadded. No mandate to pursue that course is expressed or implied. Authority to let contracts for transportation of the ocean mails, after advertisement for proposals, has long existed on the statute-book, unexercised for years, and it was never thought to be obligatory on the Department to exert it.

* * * * * * *

No rule of interpretation authorizes the presumption that Congress designed another construction to be given similar terms in this act, or a greater obligation to employ a discretionary authority here. Presumably it was supposed additional power might become necessary to secure the service, because the compulsory law had been repealed.

* * * * * * *

Now, it strikes me that these are good and sufficient reasons. It may be, Mr. Chairman, that I am a little prejudiced toward one side, as my friend from Michigan is toward the other.

I remember quite vividly the scenes of the closing hours of the last Congress. I remember how this law was whipped through by intimidation and threats of an extra session and by the most pathetic appeals to our patriotic sentiment. It was a sight to make the angels weep, Mr. Chairman.

It was a farce and a mockery, appealing to the patriotic sense of the Congress of the United States in order to secure another subsidy for the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

Do not you remember the sense of shame and humiliation that came over us when Mr. Kasson, of Iowa, in the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, submitted a report from the Committee on Ways and Means, from which I read:

The results of the evidence are, that about $900,000 was disbursed upon the allegation that it was used in aid of the passage of the act now under investigation; that about $565,000 appears to have been paid to the exclusive use of persons having no official connection with such legislation; and that the disposition of the remaining $335,000 remains in doubt upon the evidence presented, but without any testimony showing that it was a reward paid to any person at that time a member of either House of Congress; and that the uncertainty attending the disposition of this latter sum is owing to the refusal of William S. King to testify the truth, and to the failure or refusal of John G. Schumaker to present all the facts which the committee believe it was in his power to give.

The enormous evil attending the existence of an unregulated lobby, with license to appear before committees and urge measures upon members upon fraudulent pretense that they are acting for the public interests when they are privately retained by interested parties, calls for further legislation. The committee deem it necessary for the protection of Congress against future transactions as discreditable as those they have now brought under review, that a law should be passed requiring every person appearing and advocating measures for a private interest to appear in his true capacity as a retained attorney or agent.

Every member of the Forty-eighth Congress who was present during the protracted debate on the law in question knows that the moving spirit was the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, that it was in fact a subsidy solely for their benefit, and I am credibly informed that the attorney for this corporation, Mr. Lauterbach, last summer claimed that it was well understood that that was the intent of the law. This gentleman for years has been a conspicuous and frequent figure in the lobby of Congress.

The Pacific Mail Steamship Company has always done their business in a very systematic manner. They always kept their eye on Uncle Sam's cash-box, anxious to transfer a part of its contents to the coffers of their company. They always had to do a good deal of hard work to accomplish their end, but with a pertinacity worthy of a better cause they kept "pegging away."

There were two sections of the Revised Statutes that had to be repealed to pave the way to the Treasury. Those provisions of law were as follows:

The master of any vessel of the United States bound from any port therein to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port of the United States, shall, before clearance, receive on board and securely convey all such mails as the Post-Office Department, or any diplomatic or consular officer of the United States abroad, shall offer; and he shall promptly deliver the same, on arriving at the port of destination, to the proper officer, for which he shall receive 2 cents for every letter so delivered; and upon the entry of every such vessel returning from any foreign port, the master thereof shall make oath that he has promptly delivered all the mail placed on board said vessel before clearance from the United States; and if he shall fail to make such oath the vessel shall not be entitled to the privileges of a vessel of the United States.

The foregoing provisions were enacted in 1864.

Subsequently, and in 1877, it was provided as follows (section 4203 of the Revised Statutes of 1878):

All vessels belonging to citizens of the United States, and bound from any port in the United States to any foreign port, or from any foreign port to any port in the United States, shall, before clearance, receive on board and securely convey all such mails as the Post-Office Department of the United States, or any minister, consul, or commercial agent of the United States abroad shall offer, and shall promptly deliver the same to the proper authorities on arriving at the port of destination, and shall receive for such service such reasonable compensation as may be allowed by law.

These snags were removed by an act entitled "An act to remove certain burdens on the American merchant marine and encouraging the American foreign carrying trade, and for other purposes," approved June 26, 1884. Would it not have been more intelligible to the average American mind to have substituted for the words "and for other purposes" perhaps these: "And to enable the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to levy upon the people of the United States a tribute of $350,000 per annum, to be paid to the stockholders of this great corporation for their well-known patriotism and unselfishness?" [Applause.]

After these obstacles were out of the way came the act of March 3, 1885.

It appears that the Pacific Mail Steamship Company has certainly profited by their trips to China; they are as "childlike and bland" as the most cunning of the sons of the Celestial Kingdom. The contracts are to be made at a rate not exceeding 50 cents a nautical mile on the trip each way actually traveled between the terminal points, and right here I wish to call the attention of my friend from Michigan. He found fault that the Postmaster-General had computed the miles traveled both ways. Does not this act provide for both ways, and does that not double the number of miles? In my opinion he, and not the Postmaster-General, is four hundred thousand miles away from the truth. Contracts to be made with the lowest responsible bidder!

We can imagine what the bid of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company would have been, they being the sole bidders. Mr. Chairman, the passage of this law was one of the most brilliant schemes of modern financiering. It entitles its authors to the front rank of the great financiers of this country. Business is always the first and most patriotic consideration of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. They remind me of a little anecdote I heard after the last campaign in Chicago. There lives in that saintly city a certain gentleman who prides himself upon his great political influence. He offered his valuable services to both political parties for a valuable consideration and they were accepted. All he did, however, was to coolly pocket the "swag."

When after election it was found that he had taken money from both sides, and being severely lectured for his duplicity, he merely said: "Well, what of it?" "Promises are promises." "Politics is politics, but business is business." [Laughter and applause.]

And business it is with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. This company received for their services for the year ended June 30, 1885 (page 822), $26,053.57. The total number of miles traveled was 708,830. Had the Postmaster-General lived up to their expectations and done what they wanted him to do they would have received $354,415, or an additional sum of $328,361.60 for the same service they for twenty years had performed for $26,053.37.

Now would that not have been a splendid achievement?

Rated at 6 per cent. it would have increased the value of their stock to the modest extent of $5,472,683.

Now, I admit that such a prospect is well worth fighting for and I can readily appreciate the chagrin and the anger of that corporation when the thing fell through, after having fought for it like a pack of wolves for the bleeding carcass of a lamb. [Laughter and applause.]

I have said, Mr. Chairman, and said so advisedly, that this act was passed for the sole benefit of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. I read from the report of the Postmaster-General, pages 20 and 21:

By the act of June 26, 1884, the statutes, which during over twenty years have secured the service of American vessels as mail carriers, were repealed, to take effect on the 1st day of April, 1885; and soon after my assumption of duty inquiries were received from two of the steamship companies concerning the course to be pursued by the Department during the quarter-year to begin with that date.

No time had then been afforded for consideration of the future policy of the Department, nor had any apprehension of difficulty in regard to it been conceived; and inasmuch as no special appropriation for the quarter-year beginning with April had been granted, the request was made in reply that the service should continue upon the same terms upon which it had previously been rendered. No others addressed the Department in respect to the particular period, and all the American companies which had before that date been employed as mail carriers continued to transport the mails during that quarter at the same rate of compensation which they had theretofore received. Verbal application was, indeed, made on behalf of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company to carry the mails during the three months without determination or payment of any fixed compensation, leaving that to be the subject of special application to Congress.

This company has always had great faith in "special applications" to Congress, and usually they were very successful. Had the Postmaster-General complied with their demands, he would have established a precedent which this powerful corporation would have taken the most advantage of, and which could not have been broken for many years to come.

My friend from Michigan, in his able argument on the other side of this question yesterday—and it was as able as could be made in such a cause—tried to ridicule the comparative table of the Postmaster-General by comparing the mails carried with hides as freight.

I read from the Postmaster-General's report, pages 40 and 41:

The actual service rendered by the carrier consists in taking the mails from the post-office at the port of departure, inclosed in locked bags (of leather for letters, and usually of canvas for paper mails), conveying them to the vessel, depositing them in the "mail-room," to remain until arrival at the port of destination, when the bags are conveyed to the post-office. The mail-room is commonly a small interior room occupying no more, and no more valuable, space than the passengers' baggage-room. In some vessels it is sheathed or ceiled with thin iron. Besides providing this room and keeping it securely locked, no special guard or care is required during the voyage, unless some accident demands. No responsibility as an insurer rests on the carrier. Such liability for loss as he undergoes is dependent on proof of negligence; and probably few, if any, instances of pecuniary mulct for such loss can be found.

The "express" or "parcels dispatch" service, which is performed by these lines at the rates indicated on the tables, appears quite as burdensome and expensive as mail carriage. Parcels are received from various persons, conveyed to the ship, transported to the port of destination, and delivered to the consignees there; and the price for carriage usually covers an insurance of $25 on each parcel, and all port charges except customs duties.

The baggage of passengers imposes as much trouble, cost, and burden on the ship as the mails, except that it is received and delivered at the ship.

On the other hand, in most ports vessels which carry the mails receive special advantages; in some, only greater facility of entering and debarkation; in many, exemption from port charges of various kinds and different amounts. Incidental benefit arises from the repute of Government employment.

It will be seen at once from the accompanying tables that if the quantity of mail carried be considerable the compensation is generous. The total weight of the trans-Atlantic mails carried from New York last year by eight lines of ships was 2,194,066 pounds, and at sea postage yielded to the carriers $270,157.63, the compensation varying from $2,854.39 for the most profitable trip to 19 cents for the lightest, and averaging $609.36 per trip the year through. This was over thirty-four times what the same weight of freight would have been transported for, and nearly four times the charge for parcels of dispatch matter of the same quantity; and these rates increase in disproportion on the better trips on which, in fact, the mail was chiefly carried. These figures prove the rate of sea postage to be abundant. Undoubtedly the trans-Atlantic carriage could be procured at lower rates, if it were desirable to forego frequency of transmission and employ but one or two lines instead of all.

The American lines have received a less compensation in amount only because the mails they carried have been so small in quantity. But 8.37 per cent. of our foreign letter mails last year was sent to all the countries and islands of this continent and across the Pacific seas, and not so much by all the American steamships. To some American lines the rate of payment has been greater than sea postage. To all but three the compensation has been more than would have been demanded by them for the same matter carried for individuals at express rates; and in the excepted three cases but a little less. Altogether, the Government paid them nearly one-third more than a private person would have found necessary to procure the same transportation; and the carriers generally received more pecuniary advantage than is represented by the payments made them by the Government.

* * * * * * *

The fact that all other steamships, by whomsoever owned, seek the service at the sea-postage rate only, upon every route on which they sail, seems to reasonably demonstrate the statement. No vessel, domestic or foreign, has declined the service, except in the instances which are hereinafter stated.

It is also significant that the paper mail averages three times the weight of the letter mail, but is readily carried at the sea-postage rate of 4½ cents per pound, and in the same manner as letter mail, on which the like rate is 43.75 cents the pound.

The general conclusion seems sustained by the facts that, except special circumstances should require a greater, the rate of sea postage is remunerative for the service of carrying the mails.

That statute authorizes the entire sea and inland postage to be paid to American steamships, although but sea postage may be allowed to foreign vessels—a proof of the legislative judgment that the latter rate is sufficiently remunerative to command the service, as the fact is.

This statute appeared to afford power to make abundant compensation for all the service necessary until the next session of the Congress.

The accompanying tables, prepared in the Foreign Mails Office, show that this would have yielded to the following American companies, on the basis of last year's business, respectively:

* * * * * * *

On its San Francisco and Panama line, $3,494.18 for about 7 tons, against $1,238.44 at sea postage, $71.69 at freight, and $1,002.55 at parcels-dispatch rates.

On its San Francisco and Yokohama line, $10,123.80 for less than 19 tons, against $3,506.64 at sea postage, $226.34 at freight rates, and $3,758.40 at parcels-dispatch rates.

On its Australian line, $41,018.65 for about 48 tons, against $13,565.29 at the special rates paid heretofore, $762.93 at freight rates, and $9,537.40 at parcels-dispatch rates; an average per trip of $3,155.28 for 7,336 pounds, nearly fifty-four times its freight rates, over four times its parcels-dispatch prices, and a better average price per trip than the average paid across the Atlantic by $2,505.92.

To the Venezuelan Red "D" line, $3,942.86 for about 8 tons of mail, against $1,392.95 at sea postage, $58.34 at its freight rates, and $1,155.01 at its parcels-dispatch rates.

To the New York and Cuba line, $5,203.48 for about 12 tons, against $2,271.94 at sea postage, $61.63 at freight rates, and $1,548.17 at its parcels-dispatch rates.

To the New York, Havana, and Mexican line, $11,932.11 for about 25 tons, against $4,134.13 at sea postage, $129.17 at freight rates, and $3,229.33 at parcel-dispatch rates.

These facts seem to prove that the total sea and inland postage is an abundant recompense for the proposed service; and, without further recapitulation, reference to the tables will show the amounts to the other lines a proportionate compensation. If this be correct judgment, no more could be rightfully expended of the appropriation unless other objects were to be sought than the care of the postal service.

* * * * * * *

But the policy of subsidizing American steamship companies, or any of them, is not involved in the decision arrived at. That pertains to Congress instead of the Department, and therefore the Department can only award just compensation and then stop. If exigencies may arise to justify its adoption, it seems to belong to that body to recognize their existence and prescribe the object and amount of the grant.

No exigency exists for the establishment of any new lines to carry the mails. Those now on the sea as common carriers are sufficient for the present needs of the foreign mail service. They appear to have maintained themselves for years without Government bounty in profitable pursuit of their business.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Postmaster-General offered to pay the Pacific Mail Steamship Company sea and inland postage for carrying the American mails.

This they flatly refused, believing that they could coerce the Department into paying them 50 cents per nautical mile each way, or $350,000 instead of $39,000.

What happened then? The Oceanic Steamship Company, another American line, offered to perform this service just as frequently and just as quickly as formerly done by the Pacific Mail for $20,000 per annum, binding themselves for three years, with option on part of the Postmaster-General to terminate the contract at any time.

They are carrying the mails now at that compensation voluntarily, and the American flag, which is the object of so much solicitude, floats at the mastheads of these vessels just the same as if they were carried by the Pacific Mail. I wish to call the attention of the committee at this time to a letter by Postmaster-General Blair, which I read:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., March 3, 1862.

GENTLEMEN: I have received formal notice from Cornelius Vanderbilt, controlling the steamship line to Aspinwall, that he will not take the South Pacific or any other mails after the 21st instant. This is an attempt to coerce Congress to contract with him on his own terms for carrying these mails. I called the attention of Congress to the coercive system exercised by the railroad companies upon the Government in my annual report. I trust suitable measures will be adopted before adjournment to maintain the public interests in that behalf. But this steamboat coercion requires immediate attention. Unless something is done at once the vast mercantile interests will be seriously affected.

My own opinion is that this and every other line of steamers leaving our ports should be required to take mails to their ports of destination upon such terms as are now or may hereafter be allowed by Congress as the condition of their clearance. It is not pretended that the compensation now given is not sufficient for the service rendered. No private person pays them for any kind of transportation at the rate paid by the Government for mail matter. We give all and more than we make out of it, and no persons are so much benefited incidentally as the owners of the ships, for the bulk of the correspondence relates to the trade carried on by their vessels.

Yours, respectfully,

M. BLAIR, Postmaster-General.

Messrs. COLLAMER and COLFAX,
Chairmen, &c., Senate and House of Representatives.

It was a bold attempt of Cornelius Vanderbilt to force the Government to come to his terms. Precisely the same thing has been attempted by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company. It was a clear case of attempted black-mail of the Government. But luckily it did not succeed. For a while we experienced embarrassment. Now the mails are carried as well as ever, in many instances better than before, and besides, none of the American lines have ceased to run, nor has American commerce suffered to the slightest extent.

One point, however, has been gained, and that is, that this great Government of the people, for the people, and by the people demonstrated that, thank God, the time has not yet come when we must bow in humble submission to the power of aggregated wealth and allow ourselves to be taxed and mulcted for the benefit of Eastern money-kings, paying our tribute to them, that they may amass princely fortunes, live in regal splendor, rivaling in fabulous wealth Dumas's creation of the Count of Monte Christo, and then with mock seriousness tell us that all this is so for the higher glory of the American flag. [Laughter and applause.]

I love, Mr. Chairman, that flag whose graceful folds adorn the wall behind you. I love it because to me it is the emblem of equal rights, because it proclaims to monarchical Europe that under this flag no aristocracy is tolerated. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have voted in committee to re-enact the compulsory law. For doing that I have been censured severely by newspapers of my own party. I do not complain at that, for I believe they were mistaken and I was right.

I do not at this time propose to enter into an argument on this compulsory question, but wish merely to state that it does not seem to me inconsistent for a Republican member of Congress to favor the re-enactment of a law that was passed by a Republican Congress, was in force for over twenty years during a Republican administration, and was then repealed by a Democratic Congress.

My friend from Michigan yesterday read from House Report 534, part 2. Let me read a letter from page 13 of the same report:

Hon. John A. Kasson, recently minister to Berlin, answers the inquiry of the Secretary of State as follows:

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES, Berlin, March 30, 1885.

SIR: Inclosed herewith I transmit a copy of the law recently passed by the Reichstag granting subsidies for the establishment of three new steamship lines for the further development of German commerce and German interests in foreign countries, with translation of the same.

The contract is made for fifteen years, the annual amount for the first two lines being 4,000,000 marks, and for the tributary lines 1,000.

The determined resolution of the chancellor to provide this new opening to market for the surplus manufactures of Germany, to open new spheres of employment to the enterprising German people, and to increase the influence of Germany in the world, enforced by his powerful and patriotic arguments in Parliament, carried the day over the combination of opposing parties. Happy country, whose intelligent and patriotic statesmanship is not howled down by the demagogue's cry of "jobbery."

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN A. KASSON.

These lines, Mr. Chairman, were probably, for all I know, to Kamerun and to the Congo, and perhaps to the Sandwich Islands and other parts of the globe where Germany is trying to acquire territory by annexation or otherwise for colonization purposes. These lines are in all probability the outcome of Prince Bismarck's colonization schemes. But be this as it may, Mr. Chairman, I lived in that "happy" country up to my twenty-first year, and I ought to know something about it.

The German people, Mr. Chairman, are all right, but woe to the country. Happy country, indeed, where one man rules with a rod of iron, where the common people are held in contempt, where man must belong to the nobility or else be immensely rich before he has any social standing at all, where the liberty of the press is a parody on liberty, where one can express the honest convictions of his heart only at the peril of being thrown into prison, where the poor are taxed to starvation to support a favored class in idleness and luxury, where there is only a reigning class and subjects, where espionage and flunkyism are at a premium! Happy country, which hundreds of thousands annually leave for this land of the "demagogue!" Happy country, where the soldier who has lost his limbs fighting for his king is thrown upon the cold charity of the world with a grind-organ for his companion!

Happy country after all, for it pays large subsidies to great corporations owned by the privileged classes. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that if our own poor, downtrodden Jay Goulds and Vanderbilts will find out what a happy country Germany really is, when they will learn that the demagogue's cry of subsidies has no terror for the man of blood and iron, they will turn their backs upon this unhappy country of ours and devote the remainder of their precious lives to the procurement of subsidy schemes in "happy" Germany! [Great applause.]

It is an old trick of those parties who come before Congress and ask for subsidies to appear under the guise of patriots and public-spirited citizens who have solely the welfare of the nation at heart. Their own interests are nothing to them, or at best only of secondary consideration. In the case now under discussion a gratuity is asked in order that our commerce and shipping interest may be extended; only this and nothing more. Now, it is about time to look at this matter in the light of reason and common sense.

The advocates of subsidies—and I grant that many are perfectly sincere—point to the time when we did more than one-third of all the carrying trade of the world. They seem to think that by legislation, by changing our navigation laws, and by subsidizing steamship lines we can reconquer this lost trade.

I venture to say that these gentlemen are laboring under a delusion. You can simply not accomplish it. The conditions of affairs have changed so much that these measures will be of no avail.

At the time you refer to, up to 1857 perhaps, most of the carrying trade was done in wooden vessels, which we could build cheaper than anywhere else. To-day the iron steamer has replaced the old wooden ship, and we can not build them as cheaply as they are built on the Clyde. An iron steamer sailing under the American flag costs at least 20 per cent. more than the same vessel run by an Englishman or a German.

Thirty years ago we had very little manufacturing; our people took to the seas in order to gain a living. To-day the business of sailing is less remunerative than land pursuits. That is the reason we have no sailors to-day.

Thirty years ago the difference in wages between this and other countries was not as great as to-day, and the cost of running an American vessel was relatively less than now. No American who in the first place has to pay more for his vessel than his English competitor, and who has to pay more for sailing it than he, can expect to compete successfully with him. It is an utter impossibility.

Even the American merchant who sends a ship-load of goods to some foreign country engages for that purpose that vessel which will do it cheapest. Sentiment, like the flowers of spring, has nothing to do with his case. [Laughter.] Then look at the question of commerce. You say you want to create a market for our surplus manufactures. How can you expect to compete in the markets of the world with English, French, and German goods, that on account of the cheaper labor employed can be sold for so much less than our wares?

Our goods are more expensive, our carrying is more costly, and still you think that by subsidizing a few steamship lines you can force other nations to abandon their cheaper markets and buy from us. What a childish idea!

I tell you, gentlemen, you can not have everything at once. You can not expect both our home market and the markets of the world. You can not own the whole earth. I, for one, would rather control our own market than to sacrifice it for the sake of doing the carrying trade we formerly did. And that is about all you could expect. The other nations of the world, having so much the start of us, would struggle with might and main to hold their trade. I do not think you are willing, in order to secure questionable benefits, to break down our protective system at home and open our immense home market to the unrestricted competition of foreigners.

Do you want to cut down the wages of the laboring men so we can manufacture as cheaply as Europe, opening the doors to the products of their cheap labor so that we may share the markets of the world with them? Where do you want to sell your goods? Do you want to undersell the nations of Europe in their own markets? Do you think you could do that without total ruin to ourselves? No, Mr. Chairman; let us do what we can to secure to ourselves as much as possible our home market; that will keep us busy for a good many years to come. Do not be led astray by the siren songs of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company nor the effusions of sentimentalists.

I wish we could have a merchant marine as large as that of England. If we could gain this end without sacrificing larger interests I would rejoice. But knowing that we can not, I stand by that policy which in my opinion secures the greatest good to the greatest number of American citizens, and that is the policy that has been pursued by this nation for more than twenty years. And if grasping corporations, in their greed for gain, and having nothing but their selfish ends at heart, come to the Congress of the United States, posing in the rôle of disinterested patriots, singing their plausible songs of the revival of American shipping, asking for subsidies under a different name and expecting ten dollars for every dollar of service performed, do not allow yourselves to be deceived, but tear off the mask and expose their Shylock faces to the country. [Prolonged applause on both sides of the House.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes left. Does he desire to reserve that time?

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the time for the recess has arrived, and if the gentleman from Georgia desires to move that the committee rise, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5887) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River. The message also requested a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and announced that the Senate had appointed as its conferees Mr. DOLPH, Mr. SABIN, and Mr. RANSOM.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States authorizing the temporary appointment of an acting assistant treasurer; when the Speaker signed the same.

DAM ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. NELSON. I rise to a question of privilege. The Senate has just returned with amendments the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River. On this bill the Senate has requested a conference. I move that the House non-concur in the amendments of the Senate, and agree to the conference asked.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. DUNHAM, Mr. CRISP, and Mr. BYNUM as the conferees on the part of the House.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw from the files of the House, for reference to the Pension Office, papers in the case of Bertha M. Timony, minor child of Joseph Brocklebank.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

Mr. BLOUNT. I move that the House now take a recess till half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The session of to-night has been specially assigned for the consideration of resolutions on the death of Mr. RANKIN, late Representative from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past 7 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past 7 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. MCCREARY as Speaker pro tempore.

The Clerk read the following:

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk of the House:

SIR: I hereby designate Hon. JAMES B. MCCREARY to preside at the session of the House this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

MARCH 25, 1886.

DEATH OF HON. JOSEPH RANKIN.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, two weeks since I announced to this House the death of my colleague, JOSEPH RANKIN, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin. I then stated that at some future time I would invite the attention of the House to the consideration of resolutions in respect to his memory, and asked that a time be fixed when his associates and friends could speak of his virtues as a citizen and a legislator. That time, sir, has now arrived under an order of this House, and I send to the Clerk's desk resolutions which I ask to have read and considered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the business of this House be suspended that suitable honors may be paid to the memory of Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin.

Resolved, That in the death of Mr. RANKIN the country has sustained the loss of a safe legislator, a patriotic citizen, and an able and faithful public servant.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to his memory the House, at the conclusion of these ceremonies, shall adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. BRAGG addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am invited to a discussion of the resolutions before the House to-night by the impulse of my own heart and because of a deep affection and sincere friendship for the departed Representative whose memory we now honor. Personally I have known Mr. RANKIN only from the commencement of the Forty-eighth Congress; but for many years prior to that I knew him well by reputation, as did all of the public men of our Western country, for he was a man of a reputation not confined to his own State.

Something like a year ago, I think it was, when he returned to this city after a severe illness, I called upon him at his hotel and in a joking way said to him: "Joe, if you are going to die, I promise you one thing, that I will talk on the occasion of the ceremonies attending your death." He looked at me with one of his pleasant smiles and said, "If you do, I do not want you to tell any lies about me." That, Mr. Speaker, is a key to the character of JOSEPH RANKIN. It told the man. Little did I dream that night that so soon it would become my painful duty to speak on the occasion of his death; but I would be unjust to the memory of a man that I respected, and much more than that, did I not remember the injunction which in that conversation he laid upon me.

Mr. Speaker, I do not come to this resolution equipped with any set forms of speech. In my heart there is that which I would like to leave to the memory of JOSEPH RANKIN, and I must trust largely to that feeling to shape my thoughts. He was a typical Western man; plain in his manners, simple in his speech, direct in his methods, conscientious in his thoughts, brave when necessary, cowardly never, either in thought or act. That was his reputation before I knew him, and so my acquaintance read him afterward. He was a man of affairs—of what we might term faculties. When large business interests were complicated with troubles, and when a man of integrity, of skill, of shrewdness and ability was needed, they naturally turned and looked to Mr. RANKIN.

All who knew the man will bear me out in this. He never betrayed a trust. There was not money enough in America to buy JOE RANKIN from his duty; and in the discharge of any trust that was imposed upon him he was one of the very safest of men. One reason for this was that he could read men. No one would ever approach Mr. RANKIN and talk to him long with the idea of deceiving him. The keen eye would soon be turned upon the man who was playing with him, and he would abandon that line of approach.

There was something in his eye that said, "I am not the man to be imposed upon in that way." He was a reader of men. Instinctively he knew what was in a man's mind although his words might be used to cover his real thoughts.

Mr. RANKIN'S bond was good. His word was as good as his bond. His bond was no better than his word. He was slow to give promises, but when that promise once promised anything, you could dismiss the matter from your mind; that which he undertook to do would certainly be done. This was a marked characteristic of the deceased.

He was an approachable man. I liked that in JOE RANKIN. We have three kinds of men in public life, Mr. Speaker. We have one class of men who seem to fold themselves up in their dignity, in their imaginary greatness, if the people lay a little honor upon them. After that the people can not get up to them very much. They seem to be loaded down with the heavy thought that every word that falls from their lips is something very weighty, something that should be treasured up for coming generations, and one has a natural timidity in approaching them. When walking from one end of the Capitol to the other it would seem almost as though this building would shake under their tread. I used to be impressed a great deal with that when visiting the Capitol, and I have observed it some since. JOE RANKIN did not belong to that class.

There is another class of public men who make promises with great ease. You ask men of this class if they will do so and so. The reply is, "Oh, certainly; with great pleasure. I will attend to it at once without fail." They are easily approached; but when their backs are turned the promise is forgotten, and it never enters their heads again. JOE RANKIN did not belong to that class either. But there is a class of plain, earnest, approachable men who are careful in what they say, and when they say a thing they live up to it. They are men like these: A child is lost in a great city or in a town, or a poor farmer is in a big city for the first time, and, having lost his way, he wants information. He may stand for a long time watching the faces of the passers-by for a face that he can address. Who of us has not been there at some time in our lives watching for a face we would dare speak to? Finally, the child or the man sees a face that says there is a kind heart back of it, and the child or the poor man will stop the owner of that face to ask a question. Five hundred might pass by on the streets of a great city without being stopped by such a child or such a man; but if Mr. RANKIN came by they would stop him, and he would stop, listen attentively to their questions, and give them the fullest information he had. His genial, plain, honest, manly face would draw the poorest man or the trembling child to him for information. That was JOE RANKIN.

My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] says he knew him as a soldier. That is true. When this country needed men Mr. RANKIN was in the ranks, and in this connection I will send to the desk to have read a letter from the Adjutant-General of the Army in response to one from myself asking for the military record of the deceased.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, February 17, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 8th instant, requesting, for reasons stated therein, the military record of the late Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, M. C., as captain Twenty-seventh Wisconsin Volunteers, I have the honor to inform you that from the records it appears that JOSEPH RANKIN was mustered into the military service of the United States October 23, 1862, as captain Company D, Twenty-seventh Wisconsin Volunteers, at Milwaukee, Wis. The regiment left the State in March, 1863, for the field, and was subsequently assigned to the Sixteenth Army Corps, participating in the siege of Vicksburg, Miss. After the fall of that place it formed a part of and participated in the "Arkansas expedition," and in the capture of Little Rock, Ark., September 10, 1863. In April, 1864, it formed a part of the expedition to Southwestern Arkansas, in which it was engaged in the following skirmishes: April 2, 1864, at Terre Noire Creek; April 4, at Little Missouri River; April 10, 11, and 12, at Prairie D'Ann; April 15, at White Oak Creek, and April 29, at Jenkins Ferry, on the Saline River.

April 30, 1864, the division in which the Twenty-seventh Wisconsin served was attacked by the forces of General Kirby Smith, the regiment losing five men killed, one officer and thirteen men wounded, and fourteen men missing in action.

From date of muster-in to June 30, 1864, with the exception of a short period in November and December, 1863, when serving as brigade commissary, Captain RANKIN appears to have been present and in command of his company.

From July to November 28, 1864, he was on recruiting service; but on the latter date left Madison, Wis., with a detachment of recruits and rejoined his company on or about December 11, 1864.

February 9, 1865, he was assigned to duty as acting assistant inspector-general, detached brigade, Seventh Army Corps, and on March 1, 1865, on recommendation of General Veatch, to similar duties at headquarters First Division, Thirteenth Army Corps. He continued in the performance of duty as acting assistant inspector-general of that division until August 29, 1865, when mustered out and honorably discharged by reason of the muster out of his company.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
R. C. DRUM, Adjutant-General.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, my colleague sitting near me, Major LYMAN, says that he was with him through most of those campaigns, and that he was a good soldier. I am grateful for this assurance from one beside me.

Passing from that, I would say that he who knew JOE RANKIN in his social life was permitted to enter one of the choicest fields. He was eminently a man of large social qualities, not in the bacchanalian sense, not in the wild, extravagant sense; always quiet, always genial, never indulging in wit, always ripe with humor, he was one of the most agreeable men socially that I ever knew. He was a man of strong political convictions, but his politics were indulged in in the arena where they belonged. In his social life his political views never obtruded themselves, never made him disagreeable, so that as a friend you felt you were with a friend.

These qualities, Mr. Speaker, made him dear to every one who came within the range of his social powers, and any one who knew Mr. RANKIN, as I had the pleasure of knowing him, closely and intimately during two Congresses, of rather the one, will be glad to testify to the beautiful, genial, kindly qualities of the man. What was true of him as a man I understand was doubly true of him as a father and as a husband. I do not vouch for it, but I have read it, that when the last struggle was upon him he threw his arms around his children with a terrible superhuman effort, as though he would defy any power to take their natural guardian from them and as though he would carry them with him in the warmth of his love.

Mr. Speaker, I only wish that I was equipped with more words for the memory of JOE RANKIN, for such I must call him. I will not take up longer time upon a theme that I would like to dwell on much longer, but will close by saying that he was my friend and I was his, and I shall, as I believe all his friends ever will, keep a warm, tender place in my memory for the friend who is no longer with us.

Mr. HUDD. Mr. Speaker, I am sadly privileged in being allowed to take part in the memorial exercises of this hour. I stand in his place, the successor of the lamented Representative we now eulogize. I was his friend living, I did and do mourn him dead with more than the mere conventional phrases of a funeral lament. For many years his associate and colleague in the Legislature of the State of Wisconsin, politically and personally enjoying more than the common share of his confidence and daily life, I came to know him well, and to be able to say of him he had—

A combination and a form indeed,
Where every god did seem to set his seal,
To give the world assurance of a man.

JOSEPH RANKIN was in its best and truest sense a man; intuitively a gentleman, polished and cultivated into if not a brilliant statesman in the sense of dash and display, still the quiet, effective, accomplisher of purposes that had for an end and object the good of his constituents and the ultimate welfare of his State and nation—so, in its best and broadest sense, a statesman of utility and the actor in events that benefited the present and that must live into a future of historical usefulness.

Though born at the East JOSEPH RANKIN was Western bred. Coming at the early age of twenty-one to the then almost wilderness of a State, he saw his State, Wisconsin, grow into one of the foremost States of the Union, with the shaping of whose legislative, commercial, and industrial history and greatness he had much to do.

There is a heroism and a glory in civil life that endures after we have about forgotten those who have won renown and a page in the history of war and warriors. The brave, patient, successful pioneers of a State marching in the van of civilization with ax and plow and the common schools of the land, to found and perpetuate a State, carving new empires from prairies waste and amid forest dense by their strong right arm and stronger right common sense on men and measures, these are the heroes of the West—that West that brings to the Union and the Union's treasury its more than equal share of treasures in peace and stalwart men in war. He was the product of the West, this man we mourn. JOSEPH RANKIN was right royally Western in his thought, act, and speech, and as loyally a Union man, as we have heard in the noble tribute here paid to his memory by General BRAGG. We have heard how he took up his sword at the call to arms in the war of the States, wherein he sought to conquer, and did help to win and secure, that happy peace that now assures us that—

Linked in chain no blow can sever,
Shine Union's clustering stars forever.

The dead Representative was as generous as he was modest in his recollections as a soldier, and never vaunted his valor or patriotism or recalled in any harshness the causes of war's alarms, but in the same patriotic spirit that impelled him to strike for what he deemed the right recognized valor in a mistaken and vanquished foe with the right hand of fellowship. It was something more than creed with him; it was act and duty to help build in the temple of our reconstructed Union a tablet of forgiveness and forgetfulness that should hide the block and overshadow the gibbet of vengeance and red memories, to place the martyred Lincoln's golden prophecy over the altars that we rear:

The mystic chords of memory stretching from every battlefield and patriot grave to every living heart and hearth-stone all over our broad land will yet swell the chorus of the Union when again touched, as they surely will be, by the better angels of our nature.

I now recall an episode in the life of the Representative we have lost that came under my eye that will illustrate this happy thought of concord resting over the grave of war.

It was at Cincinnati, in June of 1880, when the great assembly of Democrats had nearly ended, having met and put in nomination for the Presidency of these United States that then superb in life, now heroically great and grand in death, General Winfield Scott Hancock. On the heights, and overlooking the city, and in view of the flow of the beautiful river Ohio, at a social board in the open air of night, sat the Indiana general (he, too, now gone over to the silent but ever-increasing majority) on whose staff Captain RANKIN served, at whose side he now sat. Another, one who had worn the gray, composed the third at this table of four. Music arose, rockets and cheers filled the sky of night. In the lull of a moment there came to the ears of the party I have named the answering speech from a banquet-room only a little way off, but in sight and sound, from a crippled major-general of the once confederate army, who had clasped hands with the proposer of the toast—the proposer a general on the Union side, and who, if I mistake not, was in some command where and when the wounded speaker, now a United States Senator, had fallen—the concluding words of that response came to us thus in substance: "Now we join the Union corps that is to be led by General Hancock, and we pledge the South to perpetual union, peace, and progress." RANKIN clasped the hand of his comrade and commander, with almost a tear in his eye, as he said: "General, we fought for that then; now we will go home and make it unanimous." He did live to see it if not unanimous, at least harmonious.

In what words shall we best relate the last chapter in RANKIN'S life-story? At manhood prime, the age when we look for maturity of thought and strength to act and wisdom to achieve, he received the message of fate, that, while not appalling him, brought the sackcloth and ashes of human despair to loved ones in a little household of dear wife, good mother, fair daughter, and promising son. We can not resolve him back to them. We can, as it seems we do, say to the grief-stricken ones, "Your sorrow is sacred." But we may give these outward tokens of our respectful grief—funeral honors that may not assuage, but will in time to come comfort, when those nearest and dearest to him shall seek the Congressional pages of their beloved's history to read the story of his brief public life at the nation's capital, and find how he died at his post, revered, honored, and now eulogized. With what courage he met the grim messenger, that has his billet for each, many score of his fellow-members of this Forty-ninth Congress who saw him in the last days of that passing from the here to the hereafter can attest. That patient eye, that smile, I see as I saw him last, only a little while before the Author of his being wrote the thrilling finis to the sad story of suffering that we may believe translates our late colleague in this Congress into the immortal and eternal congress of God's rest to weary feet.

One of our great American poets has so well expressed a thought in his noble verse on the departure of another that I may quote it now as a benediction to the subject of the hour—"The peace of God" to him your funeral committee, together with that great concourse of his Wisconsin friends, laid away in and among the evergreens of that far-away Western home:

As a guest who may not stay,
Long and sad farewell to say,
Glides with smiling face away.

Therefore on thy unknown way
Go, in God's peace, and we who stay
But a little while delay.

Keep for us, O friend, where'er
Thou art waiting, all that here
Made thy earthly presence dear.

And when fall our feet as fell
Thine upon the asphodel,
Let thy old smile greet us well.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Illinois. I had no notice that these resolutions would be considered to-night until yesterday afternoon, and since have been so occupied that I have scarcely had a moment in which to give thought to what I might say on this occasion. But I can not allow this opportunity to pass without giving some expression to the high regard in which I hold the memory of the late JOSEPH RANKIN.

I met him first at Cedar Rapids, Iowa, in the discharge of some responsible duties in that city but a few months before he took his seat as a member of the Forty-eighth Congress, and from that time until his death our relations were of the most cordial nature. When we met again it was at the beginning of the Forty-eighth Congress, and having been appointed members of the same committee—that on Rivers and Harbors—we were necessarily brought in daily association with each other during many long and weary months of arduous labor on that committee. And while we belonged to different political parties, our association, I am gratified to say, resulted in a friendship warm, sincere, and generous, and which remained uninterrupted until he passed peacefully away to that sleep which knows no waking.

I think I have seldom met a man with whom I was more favorably impressed at my first meeting than I was with JOSEPH RANKIN, and during our long acquaintance and association afterward as members of the Forty-eighth and Forty-ninth Congresses and as members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in the Forty-eighth Congress I found there was no change in his character, and he continued to be ever the same pleasant, genial, confiding man that I found him to be on my first acquaintance with him.

With a sad heart I visited him often during his last sickness; and when his friends knew there was not the slightest hope of his recovery it was wonderful to see how heroically he struggled for life. He was patient during his long sickness, as much so, it seemed to me, as any man I ever saw who was facing death from day to day for so many weary months. But a few days before his death, when I visited him for the last time, he said to me, "I have had a hard struggle, Colonel HENDERSON, but I am going to pull through; I am going to conquer yet." Whether he said this to give courage and hope to his faithful and devoted wife and to his loving son and daughter, or whether it was the deceptive nature of the disease which was gradually but surely taking him away, I could scarcely tell. But it was evident that he wanted to live and not to be separated by death from his family and friends; and while he realized the danger of his condition, he struggled manfully and hopefully to recover his health, I think, and maintained a cheerfulness when I met him that seemed to me surprising.

Mr. Speaker, the words I utter here to-night are not the words of mere eulogium. They are the words of a friend, speaking of a departed friend and of a friendship which was pleasant to me and the memory of which I shall ever cherish.

I shall never forget when I stood by the casket which contained all that was mortal of JOSEPH RANKIN, and in the presence of his faithful and devoted wife and daughter, looked upon his genial, pleasant face for the last time, so natural that, to use the language of Mrs. Rankin herself, it seemed as if he could yet speak to us though dead. But JOSEPH RANKIN is no more. He has gone from us forever.

Mr. Speaker, I knew him as a public man, and I think I knew him well. And as a member of this body, and a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, one of the most laborious committees of the House of Representatives, he proved himself, as I think every member of the committee who served with him will say, a most valuable and faithful member not only of the committee but of the House. He was quick in his conclusions, decided in his judgment, and active, earnest, and faithful in the discharge of all his duties. He was ever disposed to do the right thing in the right way at any and all times. I always found him to be reliable, faithful, and true in the discharge of his public duties.

It was in his capacity as a member of this body in which I knew him best, and I believe that we his associates, who still survive him and remain here to labor, would do well to pattern after the faithful, honest, and patriotic manner in which he performed his public duties.

Mr. Speaker, before I close my remarks I desire to express the admiration which I felt for the intelligent, faithful, devoted wife of our departed friend, who watched by his bedside patiently and lovingly during all his long illness, and to assure her and her children of my continued sympathy in their sad bereavement.

Mr. MAYBURY. Mr. Speaker, among the more pretentious garlands that loved and loving hands have woven to-day and bring to deck the grave of a departed friend I would offer my humble wreath, enriched only by the sincerity of my affection and the reverent memory in which I would embalm the lamented dead. It was my great privilege to have known JOSEPH RANKIN as a member of this House in the Forty-eighth Congress, and to have served with him in that body. To know him was to respect him, to know him was to love him. Every man in life writes his own epitaph. We stand here to-night looking upon the epitaph which the touches of his character have chiseled. We see an honest, cheerful smile lighting up a face full of benevolence and kindness; we hear a word of deep and loving tenderness, and we feel the hearty touch of an open and generous hand. We read the attributes that invested the character of this man and marked him as one of bright mind, great good sense, united with the qualities of a warm, trusting, and cultivated heart.

We knew him as a man of few words, and these spoken in a voice as low and tender as a woman's. We knew him as a man of many good deeds, done without ostentation. The duties of each passing day involved with him plain facts, visible and undeniable. His discharge of these duties was prompt, frank, and open. Unconsciously to him these attributes and influences touched and molded the lives of those about him, and to-day memory seizes upon them to be woven in a chaplet for his grave. JOSEPH RANKIN'S life was that of a man remarkably direct and single in all his purposes. Strong in action, and by contact with him were our lives made stronger and purer. We see in him a consistent man in all the relations of life, and all united with humility and great kindness. The sum of such a life finds its expression in the words, "a good citizen, faithful public servant, true friend, indulgent husband, and kind father."

The memory of his virtues lingers as the twilight lingers when the sun is set. He was fond of humor and devoted to good fellowship. None who knew him can forget the merry twinkle in his eye as he poised the arrow that he sent, not to pierce his victim, but to rebound from him. He was too considerate and gentle to wound by word or deed. He was one of those men whom if he had lived to old age would have been recognized as a patriarch among his friends and neighbors. There is not much left in these busy, troubled days of the old patriarchal life and feeling. The times are inconsistent with its calm spirit, its quiet, reverential ways. And yet, at times, there walks among us one who while not so venerable in years, perhaps, as to claim the tribute of fatherly affection from us all, but with such a gracious authority of character, such purity of heart, and exercising such a sway over our affections that all bow down to him with instinctive love and veneration.

To such a life and to such a character it matters little what earthly honors are paid. It is not the cheap incense that we selfishly offer to the great and to the powerful, nor the homage we pay at the feet of patronage. To the lamented dead we offer no such tribute; the service we give is won by no such consideration. The loving duty we pay them is the unbought and priceless tribute of affection. The tenderest regret that we feel is that a delightful presence has been exchanged for a tearful memory. These are the highest offerings of the human heart. JOSEPH RANKIN was pre-eminently an unselfish man. He was a manly man. Wherever good to others was to be done at the sacrifice of self and selfish convenience, his example was inspiring and contagious.

Like good Ben Adhem his uppermost thought seemed to be "write me as one who loves his fellow-men." If JOSEPH RANKIN was a stranger to those within the sound of my voice, had his goings out and his comings in not been with them, had his pilgrim feet not walked the ways and his smiles lit up the pathway which we now tread, I might be forced to speak with more reserve. But here I know that no word can seem strained or insincere. Certainly I can not overstate my own deep, cherished feelings, and I know it does not extend beyond the testimony that others now give and which I have heard so often fall from their lips while he was yet among the living. Besides, it is not praise to speak of such a life; it is rather thanksgiving. It is the answer of loving hearts to the heart of our dear lamented friend.

JOSEPH RANKIN was a man not only of great good sense and of excellent mental endowments and of an even temper, but he possessed that power which after all is the strongest that a man can wield, the power of a sympathetic, strong, kind heart. Whatever may be said of brilliancy in life and living, and whatever light may brighten up our mental and intellectual pathway through life, the human heart is, after all is said, the light of our best living.

"Thanks to the human heart, by which we live!
Thanks to its tenderness, its joys and fears."

Mr. RANKIN was in all the attributes of his character the product of the rugged experience by which in life, in a growing community on the frontier, with its privations and yet its opportunities of developing and broadening our life's vision, character is molded and matured. He was the victim of no prejudices; he had inherited none. He took an enlarged view of life's duties and its responsibilities, and was cheerful and brave in the discharge of them. He was fortunate in life; for who did not envy the apparent health of mind and body and the cheerfulness of disposition that enveloped him. Fortunate in life, I can not but feel that he was equally so in the time and manner of his death. The kind Providence that had directed his way in his days of strength and health did not desert him at the last.

Although the victim of incurable disease, when the dread Destroyer had fastened upon his pilgrim footsteps, as he lingered among us, we hoped that the pathway beneath his feet might grow brighter unto the perfect day and lead to the fountain of restored health. But while this was denied us, yet it was not when the powers of mind and body had been completely destroyed and obscured, but while we bade him hail in the vain hope of returning health, we were suddenly called upon to bid him a tearful and lasting farewell. The indomitable courage and cheerful spirit that marked his days of perfect health did not desert him in the days of suffering. A few days before his death, when the snows of a winter's day were disappearing in the sunlight, he laid upon his bed looking out wearily upon the winter scene. Here and there the ground was bare of snow and he watched the toiling horses as they drew their burden along. Turning to those who sat beside him he said, "It is rough sledding." The expression was touching and significant, not alone of the scene passing before his outward vision, but of the rough and rugged way of suffering through which he journeyed to the end.

Surrounded by a devoted family, endeared to a large circle of friends, cheered by the consolations of an assured faith, with all the lofty confidence of Seneca, coupled with the simple, childlike faith of St. Paul, he approached that gate so near to some of us and not far distant from us all. From the fields a reaper has gone. A fountain of pure and wholesome influences is dried up. And yet, when I think of life, with its sufferings, its disappointments, and its unrequited affections, I can not but recall the words of the poet and heartily but tenderly join the spirit of his lines:

I am glad that he has lived so long,
And glad that he has gone to his reward.
I can not deem that kindly nature did him wrong,
When softly she disengaged the vital cord;
For ere his hand grew palsied,
And his eye dark with the mists of age,
There came his fitting time to die.

Mr. JOHNSON, of New York. Mr. Speaker, a long or an intimate acquaintance is not always necessary to strongly attach one man to another. Some men by reason of peculiar traits of character are sometimes misunderstood, unjustly judged, and yet those very peculiarities almost unconsciously attract to the man. One may be unable to tell why; but acquaintance is easy, and as association and intercourse continue, respect and attachment are sure to follow. Such a man was JOSEPH RANKIN, the late Representative in Congress from the fifth Wisconsin district.

My acquaintance with him began in the early days of the Forty-eight Congress, when by the chance that locates us in this Chamber we had seats near each other. The disease that took his life was even then upon him, and in consequence of his poor health he was not regularly in his seat; but I saw him often, and from the first I was drawn toward him. He had at times a bluntness of expression and manner that left a wrong impression of the man. He did himself injustice, and yet, as a rule, and especially for his friends, he had a heartiness of greeting and intercourse that was irresistible, and it needed but a short acquaintance to insure for him a warm friendship and regard.

A native of New Jersey, Wisconsin has for thirty-two years last past been his home. He served three years in the Union Army, was five times elected to the assembly and four times to the senate of his State, and in 1882 was elected to the Forty-eighth and in 1884 re-elected to the Forty-ninth Congress. His long experience in the Wisconsin Legislature, where he exercised a decided influence, well qualified him to serve his constituents in the National Legislature. Though not able to be regular in his attendance on the sessions of the Forty-eighth Congress, yet he kept himself fully posted on current events and abreast of the times in the matter of the legislation of the day.

He was a Democrat, and was always ready to maintain and defend the principles of his party; and yet he was always considerate of the feelings and opinions of those who differed with him. Some of his closest friends and most intimate associates, not only in his own State, but here in Washington, were of opposite political faith to his own.

"True to his friends" is a sentence that was especially applicable to him. Once having given his confidence, he was "true as steel." When once his mind was made up on any question it was only after careful thought and consideration, but then he was ready conscientiously to maintain his position, and that too, if need be, in words that gave "no uncertain sound."

The brave way in which he battled with disease was most remarkable. Against the advice of his physician and the remonstrance of his friends he decided to come to Washington at the opening of the present Congress, and come he did, when most men would have kept their beds. Brought to the House, he took the oath of office on the opening day of this session. A few days later he came to the House again, and remained for a short time, and then returned to his rooms never again to be seen on this floor. He realized his hopeless physical condition. He went home to die. The manner in which he bore his sufferings was a marvel to those who witnessed it. Always cheerful, he tried to cheer all about him. Always hopeful, he tried to inspire others with the same precious possession.

His chief concern was for his family. How would they do without him; what could he do for them before he was taken away? But we would not intrude upon the sacred inclosure of the family circle. It is enough to say that he did all he could, made every arrangement possible, and then waited the final call that was to separate them for the remainder of this mortal life. I saw him one week before his death. Though suffering intensely, and speaking with difficulty, he was cheerful. He had a smile, a pleasant word for all who came to his bedside, and apparently faced the messenger of death without a shadow of fear. He was anxious to return to his Wisconsin home and die among home friends, but that was denied him; and on the 24th of January, 1886, he quietly breathed his last here at the capital of the nation.

The committee escorting his remains were met far outside the limits of Wisconsin by a large delegation from its chief city, and it was not necessary to be advised when we crossed the boundary line to know we were in the State of his adoption, where he had so long lived, and whose people had so delighted to do him honor. The expression on every countenance, the appearance on every side, told the story of public and private loss. We were in the midst of a mourning people. At the railroad stations in the various towns through which we passed, and especially as we neared his home, citizens thronged the funeral car, and with tearful eyes and in tender and considerate manner offered their sympathy to the bereaved family.

The day of his burial was, as we were informed, such a one as has rarely if ever been seen in the city of his residence. People of all classes seemed to have lost a personal friend, and anxious to show their respect to the memory of their representative citizen. All had kind words for the neighbor and friend who was to be seen no more among them, and all hearts seemed to go out in tender thought and solicitude for the loved ones he had left behind—the objects of his life-long efforts, of his last thought and care—his wife and children. This feeling was touchingly expressed by a local newspaper in these words:

A thousand men in the State will feel that they are to a certain extent guardians of the children he loved so well, and they will be watched when they do not know it, and their steps unconciously guided by strangers to the children, but who loved the father.

The sad procession extended from the little church, where the beautiful burial service of the Episcopal Church was observed, for nearly the entire distance of one mile, to the rural cemetery on an elevation overlooking Lake Michigan, where, on a winter's day, we laid him down in his evergreen bed (prepared by loving hands), there to await the morning of the general resurrection.

I wish I could speak confidently as to his possession of a Christian faith and experience. He was not a religious man, as we use the term; but we will not judge—that we leave to God. I can but think, however, that during the long and weary months of suffering and when so much alone with his own thoughts the great questions of personal religion, the welfare of his soul, were anxiously and carefully considered by him; and I can but hope that if not before, certainly as the end drew on and he felt his feet touching the waters of the dark river he was so soon to cross, and while his mind was full of anxious thought for his loved ones and kind provision for their earthly future, his mind also dwelt on his own eternal future, and that his confiding heart laid hold by faith and trust of the Saviour of the world, in whose name and by whose merits he should find pardon and acceptance before Him who is to judge us all.

It would be mistaken eulogy to say of any man that he had no faults. We make no such claim for our deceased friend. He had his faults, and who has not? But those who knew him best loved him most. A man of strong convictions, he was ready on occasion to express them and conscientiously to stand by them. Charitable in his judgment of others, fair to those who opposed him, considerate of the opinions of others however widely they might differ from those entertained by himself, with a warm and sympathizing heart toward all who were in need and sorrow, with a loyalty to friends that was proverbial, a most affectionate husband and father, he was, everywhere and at all times, an honest, honorable, kindly man.

With such recollections, I pay my humble tribute to the memory of JOSEPH RANKIN.

Mr. GUENTHER. Mr. Speaker, while I listened to the eloquent and fitting eulogies pronounced by the gentlemen who preceded me there arose before my vision the splendid form of him to whom to-day we pay these last sad tributes of respect and love.

I see him standing before me as of old, in the fullness of his physical vigor and the unimpaired enjoyment of his strong mental faculties before he was attacked by that fatal disease which so prematurely ended a life full of promise and usefulness to his family, his State, and his country. I feel as if his eye, sparkling with his kindly humor, were once more fixed upon me. I listen again to his words, full of frankness and sound sense. It seems to me as if I again felt the friendly pressure of that hand which he extended to me in cordial greeting twenty-four hours before the angel of death served the summons upon him and called him to that unknown land whence no wanderer has ever returned.

But, alas! it is but a vision. That keen but pleasant eye, which reflected his noble soul, is closed forever; the mouth which spoke so many kind words is silenced; the hand which we loved to press lies rigid and cold by his side; the true heart, which knew nor malice nor deceit, beats no more.

Our friend is dead!

I wish that I possessed the gift of oratory, so as to pay a fitting tribute to him whom I loved and whose memory I shall cherish as long as my memory lasts. Although we belonged to different political parties, we were always friends.

I knew him intimately for many years. For four winters we came in almost daily contact, he being a State senator and I holding an official position in the capitol of our State. We staid at the same hotel, and our intercourse was frequent and always of the most cordial nature. Then we were both members of the Forty-eighth Congress, and our friendly relations were never disturbed. He was considerate, pleasant, and affable to all.

Although a strong partisan and believing in the principles of his party, he respected honest convictions in others though they differed widely from his own.

He confided in his friends, and never betrayed confidence placed in him, no matter what advantage he might have secured thereby.

He possessed a kind and generous disposition. He was a most companionable gentleman, with a strong humorous vein running through his nature.

He was keen and quick to see a point. In questions of a political nature he was most always instinctively right.

But above all, Mr. Speaker, he had one quality which endeared him most to those who knew him, and which in my opinion was the key to the secret why he had so many friends, and I can truthfully say that no man in our State had more warm personal friends among all classes and in both political parties than he. I say he possessed one quality which drew men toward him and held them as his friends, and it was that he was always outspoken, just, and honest, alike to friend and foe.

He flattered nobody, he persecuted nobody, he maligned nobody, he belittled nobody, but he was always frank and open.

He gave everbody his due. He was true to his friends, generous to his adversaries; enemies he had none.

He was plain in his manners, plain in his attire, plain in his languge. He was a man of the people. The people loved JOE RANKIN, as he was familiarly called by everybody. None loved him more than those who knew him best. When we bore his body to his old home on the shores of the blue waters of Lake Michigan the large concourse of people who came from everywhere, in spite of the severity of the weather, testified to his great popularity. Everybody felt as if he had met with a personal loss. When I stood at the open grave, with grief in my heart and sympathy for the wife and children he had so tenderly loved, when for the last time I looked upon the somber casket that held all that was mortal of JOSEPH RANKIN, when I remembered the many happy hours we had spent together, when I saw the moistened eyes of the old veterans, his former comrades in arms, when I looked upon the sorrowful features of his neighbors and townsmen, I felt that a true, a good, and an honest man had gone from us forever and that I had lost a valued friend. With sad hearts we left him sleeping his last sleep under the silent evergreens on the hill by the lake in the garden of the dead. JOSEPH RANKIN is no more, but his memory will live among his friends and in the history of his State when we all will sleep the sleep that knows no waking.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. Speaker, each one's part in this service can little more than suggest the personality of its subject. Each tribute, taken alone, may mark one characteristic, one phase or habit of mind too prominently. Although every life has a consistency and completeness to the man who lives it, to whom its experiences are as a unit, yet its story is not easily told by another, because each one has but a brief glance at the inner life of his friend where their ways run together for a little while. But from the aggregated impressions of men we get very near to the truth. And so here to-day, from these many offerings may be given to time a faithful, symmetrical outline of JOSEPH RANKIN'S life.

My personal acquaintance with Mr. RANKIN was limited, though the public life of few men in Wisconsin is more familiar to me. For fifteen years he was a political leader in his own State. And it has sadly happened that the best, indeed almost the only, test of his powers in public service was made there.

Mr. RANKIN was a man of character and ability, and he was by organization and instinct a politician.

I use the word politician advisedly, but with some hesitation, because confusion of thought and the disproportion of ideas to words have often bound this good word to a bad service. A better discernment and the growth of language will finally restore it to correct usage. Bestowed with consideration, it bespeaks qualities of mind that challenge admiration and respect—quick intelligence, sound judgment, tireless energy, strong resolution, commanding honesty. I know well the careless speech of the day associates political management with much that is disreputable.

But, sir, discrimination demands another judgment.

Stop and consider but for a moment. A man of strength and ability, in the quiet pursuit of professional or business life, wins the confidence of his neighbors and friends. They learn to rely on his sagacity, to respect his judgment, to confide in his honor and honesty. As his circle enlarges and his powers are tested further, they amply respond to each new situation. Finally, his political party claims him for leadership and public service. Men of all trades, all professions, all pursuits follow his political management, second his efforts, do his behest to advance the party organized about the principles to which he and they are devoted.

Is there any reason, I ask you, why his nature should meet with a sudden moral revulsion, why he should be instantly transformed into something unclean, why men should all at once become his merchandise, why he should henceforth measure principles by a price, why he should become a juggler and trickster? Is not such a conclusion irrational, unnatural, monstrous? That within the compass of one human organization such opposing elements could be compounded is a psychological impossibility.

I do know that there exists a creature who is to politics what the pettifogger is to the law; and I do know that the pettifogger is not more loathed by the lawyer than the political shyster by the politician. Nor has the law's noble profession been more dishonored by her trickish knave than has politics by the political shyster. For, with the genius of impudence, the shyster has sometimes stolen the livery of the politician to dignify his calling and cover his political crimes. He does not often deceive the discerning and rarely deceives any one long, for he and the politician have absolutely no kinship, no attributes in common. The politician's capital in life is the trust which he reposes in others, which they in turn repose in him; the shyster's stock in trade is the meanness and dishonesty which he finds in humanity. The politician believes in the honor of men, risks everything on individual integrity; the shyster doubts every man, is a universal skeptic. It is not difficult to distinguish between the two; and it is a discrimination that ought always to be made in thought and speech. The key to the distinction is honesty of character. The politician can not exist without absolute, unyielding, uncompromising honesty. The same high regard for right conduct which earns confidence in business and professional life commands like tribute in politics. There is no call to party or public service where it is wanting; there is no continued success where it is not held and cherished.

More is not claimed for the politician than belongs to him. I have tried to strip the term of its vile associations and clothe it with its own dignity in order to measure Mr. RANKIN rightly as a public man.

It is not contended that he was a statesman, although I do think the statesman and politician stand much nearer together than current thought concedes. The difference in the mental characteristics of these two classes of public men is more a difference in degree of power than in kind. Mr. RANKIN did not attain to the creative genius of the statesman. He was quick to observe and satisfy the public want almost in anticipation; but he was not one to mark out a new course in governmental advancement and mold the public mind to its ready adoption.

Mr. RANKIN knew well the times in which he lived; but the statesman makes like companionship with the past and the future. He saw clearly the legitimate scope of his party principles; but the vision of the statesman is bounded only by the horizon of national possibilities. But Mr. RANKIN had in common with the statesman great sagacity, ready grasp of mind, superior energy, swift decision, bold, aggressive courage.

Nor is there any difference in the moral habit, the ethical sense of the politician and the statesman. Be he one or the other, he stands the representative of this principle or that party only so long as he stands erect in honor. One deviation, one relaxation, one bending of principle, and he falls and falls forever. Nay! woe to him though he yield only to weakness, evincing the slightest want of moral discrimination! Under the scorching breath of public suspicion a shining record of honor and integrity withers to dust and ashes. There is no escape, no appeal. His office is either a sacred trust, or the poisoned shirt of Nessus. Vain the defense of personal friends, vain his previous clean public life! Hunted from his high place by a betrayed people, retribution soon closes his career, and gives his name to the ensuing generation abhorred. No! no! politician or statesman, more than any other man must he ever bend a "vaulting ambition" to meet the last exaction of the moral law.

Mr. RANKIN was in public service for nearly twenty years; and his personal and political integrity was never questioned. While I would not be understood as placing him among the great, among the few who can be called statesmen, I would give him high rank among that more numerous and scarcely less useful class of public men who work untiringly, unceasingly, and honestly for the advancement of party organization and party principles.

Together with these traits of mind, alone sufficient to give him such prominence as a politician, were joined those generous, genial qualities which bound men to him wherever he was known. The most careful analysis could not determine whether his success in life was due more to his sagacious mind or to his open, sympathetic, cheerful, and inspiring nature. He was one who understood all men, one whom all men understood, at the first glance of the eye, at the first touch of the hand.

He was a popular man, a popular man at a time in the history of the human race when popularity is a certificate of high character. Coriolanus went banished from the gates of Rome because for him the price of popularity was to fawn and flatter; was "to teach his mind a most inherent baseness." But with the rise of the common people from the debauching slavery of ignorance and superstition up, up to sovereignty and self-government, has been lifted that word, which is ever at their level, until to-day popularity makes fellowship with dignity and self-respect. He who wins it must be manly, reliable, responsive; must be able, practical, useful to be in companionship with all men. Thus was Mr. RANKIN popular. Thus was he brother to every man. So it was that he was known and loved personally throughout Wisconsin. Soo, too, during his short stay here he made friends of all who knew him. Had he lived and continued in public service his acquaintance and personal popularity would have radiated from this center of political life as it did from his home. But the best years of his vigorous manhood were spent when he came here. He entered this House handicapped by fatal disease.

Sir, I make brief reference to Mr. RANKIN'S sickness and death only as it sustains and illustrates my view of him as a man. His long and painful fight with disease tried him under new conditions when hope could not cheer nor ambition sustain. It was a supreme test, and the manner in which he met it illuminated his past life and put upon it the seal of sincerity, courage, generosity, and strength.

At the very threshold of his new career death met him. From the first its shadow went with him in and out of these Halls; stood over him at his desk, followed him down the corridors, pursued him to his home. Month after month, waking or sleeping, in social cheer or in the still hours of the night, it was his constant companion. Before all others he was the first to know what threatened him. His ear first caught the mandate that chills the heart and slows the pulse: "Be ye ready, the summons cometh quickly."

Not for an instant did he indulge in any delusion touching the final issue. Here as before his correct judgment directed him aright. His quick preceptions saw straight to the open grave. Here as before his heroic courage and generous nature responded faithfully. Making no complaint, giving no sign to friends, he directed all the purposes of his being with increased solicitude toward his family's future. He resolved that the end should not come until every protection that love could suggest and energy secure was thrown around them. Quietly but with dispatch titles were re-examined, transfers made, books balanced, checks drawn, everything put in order. With what tenderness he lingered over each act that gave assurance of comfort and competence to wife and children! For he felt that in every service then rendered there passed something of his personality to live with them through life. All was at last in readiness, and he turned again to face death.

Yet it did not fall to him to go quickly and easily to his rest. Season followed season and the extremes of agony were borne with marvelous patience and endurance. Finally, with waning strength, the struggle narrowed to the limits of his room. Still considerate of those near him, he would scarcely admit even then that he was not well. He could not bear to see loved ones bowed prostrate before the dark mystery that was surely entering their home. With family and friends he forgot self, the torture of disease, all else, turned the serious words of physicians into jest, and forced his natural, bouyant spirits and vigorous humor into active play. None who saw will ever forget the touching pathos of those scenes.

This body will long remember the daily reports of that unequal but prolonged contest. Each night his haggard face prophesied speedy death; each morn saw the prophecy unfulfilled. Sustained by an indomitable will, the vital forces yielded slowly, but yielded at last. It was the Sabbath. Outside, its potent spell had touched the Christianized world, and peace and quiet marked the hour; within the sick-room, the awful suspense of that mute unrest which signals the termination of life. Family and friends were close about him, and went with him down to where our finite section of time meets the infinite.

So he died, a strong, affectionate, generous man, though not without some faults and weaknesses; a man of convictions and courage; a consistent, able, honest politician.

Mr. THOMAS, of Wisconsin. This House meets to pay a tribute of respect to the memory of our departed friend and late associate, Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, who died in this city after a lingering and painful illness on January 24 last.

When the pulsations of life are stilled forever, it is the duty of friendship and of love to commemorate the virtues of the lamented dead. Those who knew Mr. RANKIN well will recall his manly spirit, his honesty of purpose, his loyalty to friends; and bearing testimony to these qualities, we make a tribute to his memory something more than mere form.

JOSEPH RANKIN was a true specimen of Western manhood. Although born in New Jersey, and afterward moving with his father's family to the State of New York, his active, restless, and adventurous spirit caused him to long for more stirring scenes, and in 1854, in his twenty-first year, he left home for the then far West, settling at Mishicot, in Manitowoc County, Wisconsin. In this lively, bustling town he soon entered into business, by opening, in company with another, a general store. In this he succeeded remarkably well for the time he was engaged, but his inclinations and the opportunities surrounding him led him into a political life. The community where he resided saw a safe representative man in his make-up, and if he had been unwilling it would have been almost impossible for him to have refused to serve them in many local offices, which he did for several successive years by the almost unanimous choice of his neighbors.

In 1860 he was elected to the assembly, the popular branch of the State Legislature, and he would undoubtedly have continued to serve the interests of his section of the State in the Legislature in the years immediately following had not the civil war temporarily arrested his political career. When the civil war broke out Mr. RANKIN at once enlisted himself on the side of his country's cause; he entered the military service of the United States as captain of Company D of the Twenty-seventh Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, and served as such throughout the war, and was honorably mustered out of service in 1865. As a soldier he took part in all the battles in which his regiment was engaged, the most conspicuous of which were the battles about and the siege of Vicksburg—you have heard his honorable military record read at the desk by the Clerk—the engagements that resulted in the capture of Little Rock, also the engagements of Okolona, Prairie D'Ann, and the battle of Jenkins Ferry.

He showed a coolness and bravery in the face of danger that gained him the admiration and respect of his superior officers and the love and confidence of his men.

As might be expected by those who knew him well, he was untiring in his efforts for the comfort and health of those who served under him, and every member of his company was his firm and steadfast friend—a friendship that lasted after the war was over, for every one of his men who remained within his district rendered him useful and untiring services whenever he was a candidate for office. He was as modest and unassuming in relation to his war history as the record shows he was brave. Few ever heard him say anything about his part in the war, and it was only through those who had served with him that his courage, his fidelity, and his soldierly conduct were made known.

From the colonel of his regiment to the private soldier, all declared that he was a good soldier, a brave fighter, and a considerate officer, as well as a kind-hearted, companionable gentleman. After the war, and in 1868, he went back to Manitowoc County from Tennessee, where he had been managing a plantation. He was heartily welcomed home, and in a very short time thereafter was elected a member of the county board, and was instrumental in bringing to light frauds that had been perpetrated, the discovery of which saved the county many thousands of dollars.

He was elected in the years 1872, 1873, and 1874 by overwhelming majorities to the assembly, serving in that body during that period with great distinction. In 1876 Mr. RANKIN was elected to the State senate, and was re-elected for two successive terms thereafter. It was during his service in the State senate that I first became acquainted with him. I found him genial, companionable, kind-hearted, as well as a man of great ability for political management.

Differing from him as I did politically, I could not help admiring the great tact with which he managed and controlled the interests of his party in the senate of the State. He never made set or lengthy speeches, but was one who naturally drew to himself leadership, and with his accurate knowledge of parliamentary law and a keen and ready perception he was often able, though in the minority, to extort from the majority the advantage which he desired by his ability, his good nature, his kindness of heart, his hatred of all shams.

JOSEPH RANKIN gained in the State senate of Wisconsin not only the confidence and affection of the members of his own party, but the respect and friendship of his political opponents. He was attentive to his duties and conscientious in the performance of them. I remember with what care he watched every move and proceeding, ready to oppose or defend as his judgment should dictate, and with what rapidity he was able to take advantage of any mistake upon the other side, and how when a measure met his disapproval his short, sharp questioning brought out his objections more clearly than lengthy speeches could. No persuasion and no effort could turn aside his vigilance or induce him to yield his vigorous opposition to a measure which he did not approve. And yet in both parties he could always count his friends by scores; every one who approached him became almost necessarily his friend; he unconsciously drew others to him, and by his genial deportment and outspoken honesty of purpose inspired confidence and respect.

Self-respecting and self-reliant, he was yet possessed of an unassuming manner which no circumstances disturbed and which remained unaffected by accumulated honors, and was touched by an off-hand frankness and familiarity toward his friends which put them always at ease in his presence and made the bond a strong one. And added to this was the charm of his conversation, entertainingly mingled with sparkling wit and good humor based upon the ground-work of common sense, which not only delighted but instructed.

I had not the pleasure of serving with him in this House, but I am glad, sir, to hear his political friends and political foes alike (for personal foes he had none) unite in bearing witness to his integrity, to his conscientiousness, and to his firmness of purpose on the side of what he thought to be right, and I am not suprised to find that here, as in his own State, his clear mental vision and soundness of judgment were recognized.

I will add that he was an energetic, close, and diligent student; that he was a searcher for practical useful truth, as it was his ambition to possess that knowledge of men and affairs that would enable him to well and properly perform all the duties that might devolve upon him. These qualities and qualifications made hypocrisy and deceit impossible to him. This sincerity made him when he once espoused a cause a strong and fervent partisan, with little toleration for those of his way of thinking who would in any way temporize with the other side. He was patient in defeat, and when political victory came to his side he was temperate and discreet. In all his methods and all his thoughts, in private as in public life, he was direct, outspoken, and honest.

Mr. RANKIN was proud of his State and of its people, and their interests were the object of his constant care and attention, which even the severe torture of the fell disease which held him in its merciless grasp so long could not force him to neglect in the least. He was endeared to the people of Wisconsin by reason of his faithful representation of their interests, as well as for the manly character which commanded their admiration. Especially was he beloved by those whose lot it was to toil. His own life in early days had been one of labor, and to his credit be it said that he was never ashamed of the fact, and always and at all times his sympathies were with the struggling poor.

The disease to which he finally succumbed came upon him some two or three years ago, and although he knew, as did all his friends, that it was an incurable malady, never did he by word or sign indicate any discouragement or any fear of death, but with fortitude and patience most rare, under the greatest pain and suffering, he attended to every duty, and at the commencement of this session of Congress, having been re-elected, he came from his home in Wisconsin to Washington for the purpose of assuming the duties of a member of this House, although he knew it could be but a brief service, while his friends feared that he would not survive the journey.

On the first day of the session of this Congress he came to this Chamber pale, weak, emaciated, death at his side, but smiling uncomplainingly and determined to do his duty as long as he had strength, and here he took the oath of office as one of Wisconsin's Representatives. That effort was the last, and that his last appearance here. During the short and terrible struggle that ensued between life and death he had the sympathy of every member of this House and of the entire country. When the fatal summons came it found him ready, patient, and brave; quick to the last to recognize the love and suffering of those who stood about him; to speak with his last breath words of tender encouragement to wife and children, upon whose breaking hearts they must have fallen as benediction. And so passed the spirit of JOSEPH RANKIN from this to a brighter and a better world.

You have heard from those who accompanied the funeral cortege to the State of Wisconsin how, without regard to political distinction, the people of that great State bowed their heads in sadness and in sorrow over the untimely death of one whom they loved and whose memory they will revere for all time.

And now, sir, in conclusion let me say that Mr. RANKIN was blameless in his private life, and his character in every respect was above reproach. His career is a bright and encouraging example to those young men of our country who, though in humble circumstances and poor in this world's goods, may learn from his history that diligence, honesty of purpose, and nobleness of character are a better start in life than inherited wealth, and power, and station; and that it is not so much the length of our days as the work done in them and the influence we leave behind us when the Great Giver of Life calls us to the activities of that grander sphere of promise that constitutes true living here.

Death takes us by surprise
And stays our hurrying feet;
The great design unfinished lies,
Our lives are incomplete.

But the dark unknown,
Perfect their circles seem,
Even as a bridge's arch of stone
Is rounded in the stream.

Were a star quenched on high
For ages would its light,
Still traveling downward from the sky,
Shine on our mortal sight.

So when a good man dies,
For years beyond our ken
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Speaker, I now move the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 26, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

REPORT OF CIVIL-SERVICE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the report of the Civil-Service Commission for the year ended on the 16th day of January last.

The exhibit thus made of the operation of the commission and the account thus presented of the results following the execution of the civil-service law can not fail to demonstrate its usefulness and strengthen the conviction that this scheme for a reform in the methods of administering the Government is no longer an experiment.

Wherever this reform has gained a foothold it has steadily advanced in the esteem of those charged with public administrative duties, while the people who desire good government have constantly been confirmed in their high estimate of its value and efficiency.

With the benefits it has already secured to the public service plainly apparent, and with its promise of increased usefulness easily appreciated, this cause is commended to the liberal care and jealous protection of the Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 25, 1886.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The message of the President will be printed and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment. The question of printing the accompanying report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of citizens of Steubenville, Ohio, remonstrating against the proposed increase of postage on fourth-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Chapman, Ohio, praying that liberal appropriations be made for the construction of public works, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a petition of Local Assembly No. 3672 of the Knights of Labor of the city of Saint Paul, Minn., signed by Sarah E. Kelly, M. W., and Annie H. Cullen, R. S., praying that liberal appropriations be made by the Government for works of internal improvement, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of citizens of Whatcom County, Washington Territory, praying Congress to annul an act of the Legislative Assembly of that Territory providing for the permanent location and construction of a Territorial penitentiary at Walla Walla; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Westfield, Ind., praying for the submission to the several State Legislatures of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to protect women in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a petition of Local Assembly No. 3144, of the Knights of Labor of Pierce City, Mo., praying that liberal appropriations be made for works of public improvements and for the construction of the Hennepin Canal. The petition was sent to my colleague [Mr. VEST], and I present it in his behalf, as he is necessarily detained from the Senate Chamber by reason of sickness. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of members of China monthly meeting of Friends, State of Maine, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 353) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SAWYER presented the petition of W. W. Johnson and 40 other citizens and ladies of Melrose, Wis., and the petition of C. G. Thomson and 150 other citizens and ladies of Gotham, Wis., praying for woman suffrage; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the village board of Baldwin, Wis., praying that certain amendments be made to the bill now pending in relation to interstate commerce; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CONGER presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Flint and Ionia, in the State of Michigan, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, reported the following bills without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 1367) to place the name of Thomas G. Newnan on the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. 1574) granting a pension to Sarah L. Bragg; and

A bill (H. R. 1575) granting a pension to Elizabeth Kahler;

A bill (H. R. 1579) for the relief of Amy A. Lewis;

A bill (H. R. 1589) for the relief of Newton O. Baker;

A bill (H. R. 5192) granting a pension to Elmira M. Dorman.

Mr. VAN WYCK, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1582) for the relief of Eleanor C. Bangham, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1087) granting a pension to Thomas G. Newnam, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 316) for the relief of Ethan A. Sawyers, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. COCKRELL (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1983) for the relief of William Wolfe, of Shelbina, Shelby County, Missouri; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1984) to establish a port of delivery at Worcester, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1986) granting a pension to William Knight; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN WYCK introduced a bill (S. 1987) for the relief of David L. Brainard and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR introduced a bill (S. 1988) for the relief of Laban Heath & Co., of Boston, Mass.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

INQUESTS UNDER NATIONAL AUTHORITY.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 1985) to provide for inquests under national authority; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. HOAR. I ask that the bill be read at length.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., Whenever any three citizens of the United States shall, under oath, present to any judge of a circuit court, either in term time or vacation, their petition setting forth that within the circuit for which such judge has jurisdiction any person has been killed, or has sustained serious bodily injury, or serious injury in his estate, or been threatened with injury in person or estate, because of the race or color of such person so killed, injured, or threatened or because of any political opinion which such person so killed, injured, or threatened may have held in regard to matters affecting the general welfare of the United States, or with design to prevent such person so killed, injured, or threatened, or others from expressing freely such opinion, or from voting as he or they may see fit at any election of officers whose election is required or provided for by the Constitution or laws of the United States, or to influence or affect the votes of such persons or others at such elections, it shall be the duty of such judge, as soon as may be, to hold an inquest into the circumstances of such killing, injury, or threatening, at such place within the circuit as he may appoint, and to cause to be summoned and examined before him all such witnesses as he may think proper.

SEC. 2. Said judge shall forthwith report the evidence by him taken and his conclusions of fact thereon to the President of the United States, to be by him laid before Congress.

SEC. 3. The judge may require any district attorney of the United States within his circuit to attend such inquest and to aid in preparing for and conducting the same, or he may in his discretion appoint any other counselor at law to prepare and conduct such inquest.

SEC. 4. The expenses of such inquest shall be certified by the judge to the Department of Justice, and paid out of the appropriation made for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

Mr. HOAR. I move the reference of the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I desire to say a few words upon the question.

I think it proper to say that the introduction of this bill at the present time is suggested by the reports of recent occurrences at Carrollton, in the State of Mississippi. I have had and the Senate has had no opportunity for an investigation in regard to those occurrences; but if the public press of the country, of both political parties and of all sections, may be trusted, it would seem that a wanton, unprovoked crime, resulting in the death of a large number of American citizens, has been committed, where all the victims were of one race, and I presume of one political party, and all the murderers of another.

Such occurrences have unhappily been two frequent in our history. When they are investigated by the Senate or the House of Representatives the investigation is very apt to take a political turn, and the persons who defend, or apologize, or extenuate the occurrence say that it has no political significance, it is an accident, or it is sporadic, or it is not approved by the community where it occurred. However that may be, one significant fact remains, that these things happen sometimes early in the year just before an important election, sometimes just as the campaign is beginning, and sometimes at the election itself, with one uniform result: It is all one way. In every one of these homicides the political opponents of the Democratic party are the victims and some Democrat is the murderer.

It seems to me that we should secure by proper legislation some nonpartisan judicial examination of these facts, that we may determine whether it is within the compass of the power of national legislation to suppress or prevent them; and I hope I shall have the assistance of Senators on both sides of the Chamber to make this bill effectual and thorough.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was—Ordered, That the papers in respect to the claim of William H. Randle be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

FOX AND WISCONSIN RIVER DAMS.

Mr. SAWYER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General be, and he is hereby, instructed to report to the Senate the amount of balance of pay due to the commissioners appointed by the court, and their names, and the amount due to each, appointed to examine and report on the damages against the Government occasioned by the erection of dams on the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin, now on file in his office, and if he knows of any reason why they should not be paid.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further "concurrent or other resolutions" the morning business is closed and the Calendar is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask unanimous consent again that the Army measure, in charge of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], may stand as the unfinished morning business for the next sitting of the Senate, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection Senate bill No. 777, known as the Army bill, will stand as the unfinished business of the morning hour to-morrow, and the unfinished business of yesterday will be taken up.

Mr. HARRIS. It will stand as the unfinished business for the morning hour the next legislative day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had non-concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1270) to authorize the Mississippi Water-Power and Boom Company, of Brainerd, Minn., to construct a dam across the Mississippi River; agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DUNHAM, Mr. CRISP, and Mr. BYNUM the conferees on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 5544) to amend section 304 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing the temporary appointment of an acting assistant treasurer; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolutions reported by Mr. EDMUNDS from the Committee on the Judiciary February 18, expressing the sense of the Senate on the refusal of the Attorney-General to send copies of certain papers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on an amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK]. Upon that question the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He will be here in a moment, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. While we are waiting for the Senator from Kansas to come in, I should be glad to ask the Senator from Vermont what his construction is of the third resolution—this particular language of it: "Under these circumstances the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers," &c. The exact question that I am not able to answer for myself as to the construction is, Does the resolution mean that the Senate in such cases shall not consider the nomination at all, or shall reject the nomination for the reasons suggested in the former resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I see my friend from Kansas has come in. I shall make my reply to the Senator from Tennessee later on. The matter has been spoken of before. The committee thought that it was left in a way that was perfectly clear, but I shall not take the time to state it now.

Mr. HARRIS. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will call my attention to it by and by, if I forget it.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall do so, if the Senator fails to notice it.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, contemporaneous construction of the Constitution, fortified by long usage and acquiescence, undisturbed for more than seventy-five years, has to my mind incontestably and impregnably established two fundamental propositions: first, that under the Constitution of the United States the power to appoint includes the power to remove, and that both these powers are vested in the President of the United States, subject only to the power of the Senate to negative in cases of appointment; and, second, that where the tenure of an office is not fixed by the Constitution it is held at the pleasure of the Executive.

I therefore take up this argument where the opposition leave it: I begin where they close. I concede all that they demand as to the constitutional power of the Executive upon the subject of appointments to office. If it shall appear that the report of the Committee on the Judiciary is inconsistent with these declarations, that the report and the resolutions to which we are now asked to give our assent in any manner impair or infringe upon, or are in derogation of these admitted high executive prerogatives, then I shall submit to condemnation, for my signature is appended to that report.

So far as I have been able to unravel and disentangle the complicated array of argument by which it has been attempted to destroy the force and effect of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, I understand that the objections are practically four:

First, that by the action of the majority of the Senate an attempt is made to invade the prerogative of the President by demanding his reasons for the suspensions from office that he has made. To that I interpose upon the threshold and in the vestibule of this argument an absolute contradiction and denial.

The President of the United States in the message that he voluntarily, of his own motion, sent down to this body, starts out with an absolutely unfounded imputation upon the position of the majority. He says that the Senate has been from time to time, in various ways, through committees of the body and by personal importunity, appealing to the Executive to give his reasons for the suspension of officials that have been reported to this body with the designation of others to fill the places thus to be rendered vacant.

Sir, I deny it, and I now challenge from any supporter or adherent of the administration the exhibition of a word, or syllable, or justifiable inference upon which that allegation, so often repeated with so much variety of iteration, can be properly or justly founded.

The effort has been ingeniously made to shift the issue, to darken council by words without wisdom, and to make it appear that there has been a deliberate purpose and intention on the part of the Senate to interfere with the recognized prerogatives of the Executive by demanding his reasons for suspension; and unless I hear some Senator while this debate is now proceeding and while I invite the statement—unless I hear something said in support of that averment, which I deny, and which I affirm has been made for the purpose of clouding this controversy in popular estimation, I shall assume that my denial is not to be met.

Again, sir, it has been alleged in debate, in the public press, by intimation and declaration, and it has been the basis of many studied arguments in this Chamber that there had been demands by the Senate upon the Executive for private papers in the cases sent down for consideration. I deny it. I contradict that statement by an appeal to the record; and before that great tribunal by whom this issue is to be tried and determined, I allege that that averment is without foundation. There has never been in form or in substance, directly or indirectly, expressly or remotely, any demand made by any committee of this body upon the Executive or upon the head of any Department for the production of private papers; and I shall be glad in the front of my explicit denial and contradiction if some one of the advocates, some one of the champions of the administration, will point out, before this controversy is concluded, when, where, and how there has been any demand made by the Senate upon the President of the United States or upon any head of a Department for the production of private papers.

That issue was brought in here by the administration. It is said that a guilty conscience needs no accuser. We have been told of those who "fear in every bush an officer." Sir, it was the interior consciousness of the administration out of which was evolved this phantasy, this farcical allegation, that there was an attempt on the part of the Senate to compel the production of private unofficial papers and communications in the possession of the President of the United States. No Senator doubts that the President occupies an absolutely independent position, and none would desire under any circumstances to interfere with his admitted prerogatives.

I shall strip this controversy of its fallacious incidents. I shall clear away the undergrowth of misrepresentation, sophistry, and false pretenses, that has hitherto obstructed the pathway of our consideration of the real issues that are involved in this contention. With my consent it shall not hereafter be averred before the popular tribunal that is ultimately to decide this question that there has been an indefensible and insolent attempt to impair the constitutional prerogatives of the President of the United States.

Another allegation has been that while this controversy has proceeded the Senate has been inactive, interposing partisan objections to the transaction of executive business, to prevent the execution of his high trusts by the President of the United States. I yesterday had compiled from the records of the executive office, for the purpose of showing what has been done in this particular, a statement, public under our rules, which shows that from the 25th of January, 1886, to the date of the last executive session there had been confirmed by the Senate four hundred and ninety-three nominations of officers sent down by the President. Never in any single instance where there has been a vacancy, occurring by resignation, expiration of term or proper removal upon which we could properly act, has there been an instant of delay. The Senate has not inquired whether the nominee was a Democrat or Republican, but has proceeded vigorously, industriously and steadfastly in the performance of its constitutional duties, and if there has been inaction or non-action upon nominations, I shall show before I conclude my remarks that it has been invited by the administration.

Again, it has been alleged that the action of the majority of the Senate is instigated by the purpose of keeping Republicans in office; that we are moved by partisan considerations to thwart by all means in our power the efforts of the Executive to transfer the official patronage of the Government to the party that was placed in power by the votes of a majority of the people. I am not authorized to speak for others, but for myself and for those who have accredited me here, I can not submit with patience to such an intolerable accusation.

Mr. President, the Republicans of Kansas are Republicans. They are neither afraid to be so classified nor ashamed to be thus described. They do not covet any qualifying or palliative epithets. Their attitude is neither apologetic nor defensive. They have an unconquerable pride in their political achievements, in the history they have made, in the triumphs they have won. For twenty-five years they have stood upon the skirmish line, neither asking nor giving quarter. They are Republicans not by inheritance, not by tradition, not by accident, but from conviction; and they are as steadfast in defeat as in victory. They are partisans, intrepid, undaunted, uncompromising, and they can give reasons for the faith that is in them.

They believe and I believe that for the past quarter of a century upon every vital issue before the American people, secession, slavery, coercion, the public credit, honest elections, universal freedom, and the protection of American labor, they have always been right and that their opponents have always been wrong; and, while they concede unreservedly patriotism and sincerity to their adversaries, temporary repulse has not convinced them that they were in error. There is neither defection nor dismay in their columns. They are ready, they are impatient to renew the battle. Animated by such impulses, it is not singular that they should feel that no Republican can hold an appointive office under a Democratic administration without either sacrificing his convictions or forfeiting his self-respect.

Accordingly, sir, when a little more than a year ago a Democratic administration was inaugurated, those who were in public station began with one consent to make excuse to retire to private life. They did not stand upon the order of their going; they trampled upon each other in a tumultuous and somewhat indecent haste to get out of office. There was no craven cry for mercy; no mercenary camp-follower fled for shelter to the bomb-proofs of the tenure-of-office act; no sutler crawled behind the fragile breastworks of civil-service reform for protection. They lost their baggage, but they retained their colors, their arms, their ammunition, and their camp equipage, and marched off the field with the honors of war. If at the expiration of one year a few yet remain in office, rari nantes in gurgite vasto, it is because the victors have been unable to agree among themselves or been unable to discover among their own numbers competent and qualified successors.

Mr. President, candor compels me to say that the Democracy of that State share the same temper and spirit. From 1854, when the Territory was organized, down to the 29th of January, 1861, when the State was admitted, if there was a Republican holding any appointive office it was an inadvertence; and if from 1861 down to 1885 there was a Democrat holding an official position requiring confirmation by the Senate, it was an oversight; it escaped the somewhat vigilant scrutiny of my colleague and myself and those who preceded us here.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am not of those who believe in non-partisanship in politics; and I should be recreant to the high trust confided in me were I to refrain from declaring my conviction that political parties, energetic, vigorous, and well-defined, are indispensable to the success of free popular governments. Wherever the life of States is freest and most irrepressible, there party spirit is most active and aggressive. It is by the conflict and collision of political parties that the latent and richest powers of the State are made manifest; and those whom I represent have no sympathy with the dogma that it reflects glory upon a statesman to affect independence of his party, or that it is an indication of virtue in a citizen to belong to no political organization.

Political parties are social groups in the nation, allied by common purposes and kindred aspirations for the accomplishment of beneficial results. When parties perish this Government will expire, for we all understand that in this country the only government is the party in power. Here is no dynasty, no ruling family, nothing corresponding to the functions of government under other systems except the party that is for the time being intrusted by the votes of a majority of the people with the execution of their will. And, sir, when a majority of the people declare that there shall be a change of administration, it is necessarily implied that there shall be a change of those agencies through which alone political administration can be made effectual. It is useless to juggle and palter about this matter. A change of administration is a change of policies and methods, and the Chief Magistrate is entitled to the co-operation of agents and ministers who are in sympathy with his opinions and the doctrines which he is chosen to enforce and maintain.

Sir, unless the President of the United States is to be a mummy swathed in the cerements of the grave, he must have powers commensurate with his duties. He is charged to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and unless he has the power to select the agencies through which the laws are administered, through which the revenues are collected and disbursed, the post-offices conducted, the Indians supported and controlled, the glory and honor of the nation maintained, that duty imposed upon him by the Constitution is an idle phrase; it means nothing; it is an empty formula. Charged with these great duties, liable to impeachment if they are not properly performed, how can it be claimed with justice that there shall be an interpolation of novel doctrines of reform, under which while the chief is still to be held responsible, he shall be deprived of all the agencies and ministrations under the Constitution by which they can alone be so administered, in sympathy with him and the policy that he represents?

Therefore, sir, I am confident that when it was ascertained in November, 1884, that a change of the political majority in this country had been registered, there was a general faith and conviction that a change of official holdings would follow. The Democratic party desired it; the Republican party expected it, and would have been content; and had it been done the people at large would have said with one accord, amen. But this generation has witnessed the genesis of a new political gospel; a novel organization has appeared upon earth; a new school of political philosophers who announce that non-partisanship is the panacea for all the evils that afflict the Republic. Having no avowed opinions upon the great topics of the hour, they feebly decry the corruptions of the American system, and peevishly and irritably declare that the Government is degenerate and degraded, and that the true prescription to elevate, reform, and purify the public service is to prevent the clerks from being removed out of their places in the Departments. This brotherhood has not been hitherto very largely re-enforced from the Democracy. If there has been an original civil-service reformer who has deserted from the ranks of the Democracy, history does not record his name. It has been left to the party to which I belong to afford conspicuous and shining illustrations of that class of political thinkers who are never quite sure that they are supporting a party unless they are reviling its candidates and denouncing its platform, who are not positive that they are standing erect unless they are leaning over backward, and whose idea of reforming the organization in which they profess to be classified is to combine with its adversaries and vote for candidates who openly spurn their professions and depreciate the stock in trade which they denominate their principles. Standing on the corners of the streets, enlarging the borders of their phylacteries, they loudly advertise their perfections, thanking God that they are not as other men, even these Republicans and Democrats; they traffic with both to ascertain which they can most profitably betray.

Mr. President, the neuter gender is not popular either in nature or society. "Male and female created He them." But there is a third sex, if that can sex be called which sex has none, resulting sometimes from a cruel caprice of nature, at others from accident or malevolent design, possessing the vices of both and the virtues of neither; effeminate without being masculine or feminine; unable either to beget or to bear; possessing neither fecundity nor virility; endowed with the contempt of men and the derision of women, and doomed to sterility, isolation, and extinction. But they have two recognized functions. They sing falsetto, and they are usually selected as the guardians of the seraglios of Oriental despots.

And thus to pass from the illustration to the fact, these political epicenes, without pride of ancestry or hope of posterity, chant in shrill falsetto their songs of praise of non-partisanship and civil-service reform, and apparently have been selected as the harmless custodians of the conscience of the national Executive.

Sir, I am not disposed to impugn the good faith, the patriotism, the sincerity, the many unusual traits and faculties of the President of the United States. He is the sphinx of American politics. It is said that he is a fatalist; that he regards himself as the child of fate—the man of destiny; and that he places devout and implicit reliance upon the guiding influence of his star. Certainly, whether he be a very great man or a very small man, he is a very extraordinary man. His career forbids any other conclusion.

The Democratic party was not wanting when its convention assembled at Chicago in many renowned and illustrious characters; men who had led the forlorn hope in its darkest and most desperate days; men for whose character and achievements, for whose fame and history, not only that organization but the country had the profoundest admiration and respect. There was Thurman, and Bayard, and Hendricks, and Tilden, and McDonald, and others perhaps not less worthy and hardly less illustrious, upon whom the mantle of that great distinction might have fallen; but the man who at the mature age of thirty-five abandoned a liberal and honored profession to become the sheriff of Erie, without known opinions and destitute of experience or training in public affairs, outstripped them all in the race of ambition; and when but little more than a year ago he entered this Chamber as the President-elect of the United States, he encountered the curious scrutiny of an audience to whom he was a stranger in feature as in fame; a stranger to the leaders of his own party as well as to the representatives of all the nations of the earth who had assembled to witness the gorgeous pageant of his inauguration.

Sir, the career of Napoleon was sudden, startling, and dramatic. There have been many soldiers of fortune who have sprung at one bound from obscurity to fame, but no illustration of the caprices of destiny so brilliant and bewildering is recorded in history as the elevation of Grover Cleveland to the Chief Magistracy of sixty millions of people.

If when he was inaugurated he had determined that the functions of Government should be exercised by officers selected from his own party the nation would have been content; but he did not so determine, and herein and hereon is founded the justification that the majority of the Senate can satisfactorily use and employ in demanding that no action shall be had in connection with these suspensions from office until there has been satisfactory assurance that injustice has not been done. If it were understood that these suspensions and removals were made for political reasons the country would be content, the Republican majority in the Senate would be content. But what is the attitude? Ever since his inauguration and for many months before, by many utterances, official and private, in repeated declarations never challenged, Mr. Cleveland announced that he would not so administer this Government. At the very outset, in his letter of acceptance, he denounced the doctrine of partisan changes in the patronage, and through all of his political manifestoes down to the present time he has repeated these assurances with emphatic and unchanging monotony.

He has declared that there should be no changes in office, where the incumbents were competent and qualified, for political reasons, but that they should be permitted to serve their terms. Like those who were grinding at the mill, one has been taken and another has been left. Some Republicans have been suspended and others have been retained. What is the irresistible inference? What is the logic of the events, except that, in view of what the President has declared, every man who is suspended is suspended for cause, and not for political reasons? It is not possible to suspect the President of duplicity and treacherous deception.

For the purpose of illustration, let me call the attention of the Senate and through the Senate the attention of the country, which is to judge of this matter, to the basis on which this inquiry proceeds. I read from the letter of Grover Cleveland, dated Albany, August 19, 1884, accepting the nomination for the Presidency of the United States. He says:

> The people pay the wages of the public employés, and they are entitled to the fair and honest work which the money thus paid should command. It is the duty of those intrusted with the management of their affairs to see that such public service is forthcoming. The selection and retention of subordinates in Government employment should depend upon their ascertained fitness and the value of their work, and they should be neither expected nor allowed to do questionable party service.

There is another utterance in this document to which I might properly allude further on, but which appears to me to be so significant that I will read it now. It has a singular fitness in connection with this subject that we have been discussing. Speaking of honest administration, he says:

> I believe that the public temper is such that the voters of the land are prepared to support the party which gives the best promise of administering the Government in the honest, simple, and plain manner which is consistent with its character and purposes.

And now:

They have learned that mystery and concealment in the management of their affairs cover tricks and betrayal.

Yes, they have learned that mystery in the administration of the patronage of the Government, by the concealment from the people of the documents and papers that bear upon the character and conduct of officials suspended and those that are appointed, cover tricks and betrayal. "I thank thee for that word." A "Daniel" has "come to judgment." No more pertinent and pungent commentary upon the facts of the present situation could be formulated than that which Grover Cleveland uttered before his foot was upon the threshold, that mystery and concealment in the management of the affairs of the people covered tricks and betrayal. There are tricks and somebody has been betrayed.

Again, on the 20th day of December, 1884, after the election, some of the contingent of Republican deserters who elected Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency, becoming apprehensive that there might be trouble about their thirty pieces of silver, formulated their uneasiness in words and addressed him a letter calling his attention to the professions upon which he had been elected and demanding further guarantee. To that letter, on the 25th day of December, 1884, Mr. Cleveland replied, and from that reply I select certain paragraphs, not being willing to tax the patience of the Senate or waste my own strength in reading what is not strictly material.

I regard myself pledged to this—

That is, to this practical reform in the civil service, this refusal to turn out competent and qualified officials and put in Democrats—because my conception of true Democratic faith and public duty requires that this and all other statutes should be in good faith and without evasion enforced, and because, in many utterances made prior to my election as President, approved by the party to which I belong and which I have no disposition to disclaim, I have in effect promised the people that this should be done.

Not his party, but the people, Republicans as well as Democrats. Then he proceeds to castigate the Democratic party:

I am not unmindful of the fact to which you refer that many of our citizens fear that the recent party change in the national Executive may demonstrate that the abuses which have grown up in the civil service are ineradicable. I know that they are deeply rooted, and that the spoils system has been supposed to be intimately related to success in the maintenance of party organization, and I am not sure that all those who profess to be the friends of this reform will stand firmly among its advocates when they find it obstructing their way to patronage and place.

He goes on thus, and this is a most significant promise and pledge:

There is a class of Government positions which are not within the letter of the civil-service statute but which are so disconnected with the policy of an administration that the removal therefrom of present incumbents, in my opinion, should not be made during the terms for which they were appointed solely on partisan grounds, and for the purpose of putting in their places those who are in political accord with the appointing power—

And then follows that celebrated definition which lifted the lid from the box of Pandora—but many men holding such positions have forfeited all just claim to retention because they have used their places for party purposes in disregard of their duty to the people, and because, instead of being decent public servants, they have proved themselves offensive partisans and unscrupulous manipulators of local party management.

The letter closes with this somewhat frigid assurance of consolation to the Democratic party:

If I were addressing none but party friends, I should deem it entirely proper to remind them—

That is, party friends—that though the coming administration is to be Democratic—

Strictly Democratic—

a due regard for the people's interest does not permit faithful party work to be always rewarded by appointment to office, and to say to them that while Democrats may expect a proper consideration, selections for office not embraced within the civil-service rules will be based upon sufficient inquiry as to fitness, instituted by those charged with that duty, rather than upon persistent importunity or self-solicited recommendations on behalf of candidates for appointment.

"Here endeth the first lesson!" This was in the year 1884. I now come to the declarations of 1885. Just as the Democratic State convention which nominated the present governor of New York for the position that he now holds, was about to assemble at Saratoga on the 24th, I think, of September, the President gave out for publication the letter of resignation of Dorman B. Eaton, a civil-service commissioner, which was dated July 28, 1885, and accompanied it with a letter of his own accepting that resignation which was dated September 11, 1885. It was alleged in Democratic newspapers that the President held back these letters in order to give publicity to his reply at that time for effect upon the convention, and it was remarked that it had caused a panic among the Democracy. His letter is dated, as I said, September 11, 1885, and I will read a few paragraphs showing his opinion of the Democratic party and the course that they had pursued in attempting to force him off the civil-service reform platform. After some rather glittering platitudes in regard to the work accomplished by Mr. Eaton, he proceeds:

A reasonable toleration for old prejudices, a graceful recognition of every aid, a sensible utilization of every instrumentality that promises assistance and a constant effort to demonstrate the advantages of the new order of things, are the means by which this reform movement will in the future be further advanced, the opposition—

Now, this is an epithet to which I desire to call particular attention—the opposition of incorrigible spoilsmen rendered ineffectual and the cause placed upon a sure foundation.

But not content with applying his scourge to the "incorrigible spoilsmen" of the Democratic party, the President took occasion to express his opinion in rather picturesque language of another class of politicians that had somewhat afflicted him, and to whom he was under bonds:

It is a source of congratulation that there are so many friends of civil-service reform marshaled on the practical side of the question; and that the number is not greater of those who profess friendliness for the cause, and yet, mischievously and with supercilious self-righteousness, discredit every effort not in exact accord with their attenuated ideas, decry with carping criticism the labor of those actually in the field of reform, and ignoring the conditions which bound and qualify every struggle for a radical improvement in the affairs of government, demand complete and immediate perfection.

"Supercilious self-righteousness, attenuated ideas, and carping criticism" can not be regarded as complimentary phrases when applied to the apostles of this new evangel of political reformation.

He continues—

I believe in civil-service reform and its application in the most practicable form attainable, among other reasons, because it opens the door for the rich and the poor alike to a participation in public place-holding. And I hope the time is at hand when all our people will see the advantage of a reliance for such an opportunity upon merit and fitness, instead of a dependence upon the caprice or selfish interest of those who impudently—who impudently stand between the people and the machinery of their Government.

To whom does he refer?—

You will agree with me, I think, that the support which has been given to the present administration in its efforts to preserve and advance this reform by a party restored to power after an exclusion for many years from participation in the places attached to the public service, confronted with a new system precluding the redistribution of such places in its interest, called upon to surrender advantages which a perverted partisanship had taught the American people belonged to success, and perturbed with the suspicion, always raised in such an emergency, that their rights in the conduct of this reform had not been scrupulously regarded, should receive due acknowledgment and should confirm our belief that there is a sentiment among the people better than a desire to hold office, and a patriotic impulse upon which may safely rest the integrity of our institutions and the strength and perpetuity of our Government.

The first official utterance of President Cleveland upon the 4th of March, 1885, renewed the assurance that had been given. He declared:

The people demand reform in the administration of the Government and the application of business principles to business affairs. As a means to this end civil-service reform should be in good faith enforced. Our citizens have the right to protection from the incompetency of public employés who hold their places solely as the reward of partisan service, and from the corrupting influences of those who promise and the vicious who expect such rewards. And those who worthily seek public employment have the right to insist that merit and competency shall be recognized instead of party subserviency or the surrender of honest political belief.

How this system, thus inaugurated, this amphibious plan of distributing the patronage of the country among his own partisans and at the same time insisting upon the enforcement of civil-service reform doctrines practically resulted, finds its first illustration in the celebrated circular of the Postmaster-General that was issued on the 29th of April, 1885. I do not propose to defile my observations by reading that document. I allude to it for the purpose of saying that a more thoroughly degraded, loathsome, execrable and detestable utterance never was made by any public official of any political persuasion in any country, or in any age. It was an invitation to every libeller, every anonymous slanderer, every scurrilous defamer, to sluice the feculent sewage of communities through the Post-Office Department, with the assurance that, without any intimation or information to the person aspersed, incumbents should be removed and Democratic partisans appointed. I offered a resolution on the 4th of this month calling on the Postmaster-General for information as to the number of removals of fourth-class postmasters, not requiring confirmation by the Senate, between the 4th day of March, 1885, and that date. It was a simple proposition. It required nothing but an inspection of the official register and a computation of numbers. No names were required and no dates. There was a simple question of arithmetic to ascertain the number of removals of fourth-class postmasters not included in the list sent to the Senate by the President, the salary being less than $1,000. Eighteen days elapsed. There seemed to be some reluctance on the part of the Department to comply with that request, and I thereupon offered a supplemental resolution, which was adopted by the Senate, asking the Postmaster-General to advise us whether that first resolution had been received, and, if so, why it was not answered, and when a reply might be expected.

On the second day following an answer came down. It does not include the number of places that were filled where there had been resignations. It does not include the list of those appointed where there had been vacancies from death or any other cause; but simply those who had been removed without cause and without hearing in the space of the first twelve months of this administration pledged to non-partisanship and civil-service reform. The number foots up 8,635. Eighty-six hundred and thirty-five removals of fourth-class postmasters under an administration pledged by repeated utterances not to remove except for cause, making an average, counting three hundred and thirteen working days in that year, of twenty-eight every day; and, counting seven hours as a day's work, four removals every hour, or at the rate of one for every fifteen minutes of time from the 4th day of March, 1885, until the 4th of March, 1886. And that is civil-service reform! That is nonpartisanship in the administration of this Government! That is exercising public office as a public trust!

Mr. COCKRELL. How many of these fourth-class postmasters are there?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know.

Mr. COCKRELL. About fifty-one thousand, are there not?

Mr. INGALLS. It makes no difference how many; they did the best they could, and angels could do no more. I see that the Senator from Missouri is impatient; he is anxious that the ax should fall more rapidly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will pause a moment. It is the duty of the Chair to inform the occupants of the galleries that the rules of the Senate forbid any expression of approbation or disapprobation. It will be the painful duty of the Chair to enforce that rule, if it is insisted upon.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope the Senator from Missouri will curb his impatience and restrain his impetuosity. The Postmaster-General will get through if you only give him time.

Mr. COCKRELL. He will not get through in four years at this rate.

Mr. INGALLS. One every fifteen minutes!

Mr. COCKRELL. Fifty-one thousand is the number of fourth-class postmasters, I believe, and only eight thousand in a year have been removed.

Mr. INGALLS. Only one every fifteen minutes! How often do you expect them to be removed? He has done the best he could. And this does not include the number of those who resigned; this does not include any except those who have been removed. To the Senator from Missouri rising in his seat, impatient at the dilatory procrastination of the Post-Office Department in not casting out more Republican postmasters, I say this does not include all. Undoubtedly many more than eighty-six hundred and thirty-five have fallen either beneath the ax of the Department or have been filled by partisans of the party in power as a reward for efficient and faithful party service in consequence of the retirement of thousands of patriotic Republicans; and when the Senator from Missouri attempts to convey the impression here that out of fifty-one thousand fourth-class postmasters only eighty-six hundred and thirty-five have been changed during this past year he is entirely outside of the record. It is to be observed that this is but a single Department. How many have gone out of the State Department, how many have gone out of the Interior Department, how many out of the Army and Navy Departments, and out of that illuminated Department of Justice, and out of the Treasury, of course is entirely unknown, and probably will always remain unknown till the secrets of earth are revealed at the last day. They are carefully concealed; there are no lists furnished to the press for publication. Therefore I trust that the friends of the administration will be consoled, that the complaints which have been so frequent hitherto of the want of activity on the part of the administration in finding places for their friends will be tempered by the consideration that they have done the best they could in the time at their disposal.

Mr. President, the list of official utterances is not yet complete. On the first day of this session President Cleveland again repeated his declaration that the civil service was to be divorced from partisanship, and he took occasion to inflict some more castigation upon those who were endeavoring to force him off the civil-service platform which he had declared he intended to occupy. This was his language:

> Lay siege to the patronage of Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent.

Rather florid, rather oriental phrase, but in its exactness mathematical; a demonstration in geometry could not be more explicit and satisfactory than that description by President Cleveland of the occupation and the lamentations of the Democratic party. It will bear repetition:

> Lay siege to the patronage of Government, engrossing the time of public officers with their importunities, spreading abroad the contagion of their disappointment, and filling the air with the tumult of their discontent.

A besieging, importunate, contagious, tumultuous, discontented organization.

There is more to the same effect in this document that I should like to read, but time does not serve, nor is it material, because there are other independent utterances to which I must pass; and I do this for the purpose of showing the consistent and persistent adhesion of the President of the United States to the declarations with which he started out when he commenced to administer the Government.

On the 30th day of January, 1886, the ordinary avenues of communication with the public being inaccessible, President Cleveland availed himself of the interviewer, and in the Boston Herald was printed a long letter detailing in quotations a conversation with President Cleveland, "the many points of which will be found below." This was after this controversy, if you call it so, between the President and Senate had begun to develop and there were some indications of approaching misunderstanding or disagreement:

> He next spoke of his position toward the Senate in the matter of confirmations to office. He said it gave him some anxiety, for the Senate had been a good while in disclosing what it meant to do. "They seem"—

He says plaintively—

> "to distrust me," said he, "if I am to accept what I hear from others. But I hear nothing from them. They have not called upon me for information or for documents."

That complaint no longer exists.

> "I have tried"—

He says—

> "to deal honorably and favorably by them. My purpose was announced at the beginning of my administration. I meant then to adhere to it. I have never changed it. I do not mean to change it in the future. It seems to me unjust and ungenerous in them"—

That is, in the Senate—

> "unjust and ungenerous in them to suspect that I do. If I had not meant to adhere to my policy it would have been foolish in me to begin it. I should have escaped much in refusing to begin it. It is not at all pleasant for me to disappoint, and I fear sometimes to offend, my party friends. Nothing but a sense of duty has brought me to this step. Why run all this risk and incur this hard feeling only in the end to retreat? It seems to me it would have been as impolitic as it is wrong. No; I have tried to be true to my own pledges and the pledges of my party. We both promised to divorce the offices of the country from being used for party service. I have held to my promise, and I mean to hold to it."

Then there was an answer to a question propounded by the interviewer, in which he defines his relation toward offensive partisanship in the Democratic party:

> "I did not propose to hold party service in the past in the Democratic ranks as against a man. On the contrary, it gave him a strong, equitable claim to office. He had been excluded for twenty-four years because he was a Democrat. He should be remembered for the same reason when a Democratic administration came into power, provided he was a competent man for the position to be filled. What I understand by civil-service reform, as I am carrying it out, is that the office-holders shall be divorced from politics while they fill their positions under this Government. That rule I have meant to stand by." I asked him if he was aware of any deviation from it among his appointees. "If there has been any," said he, "it has not been called to my attention." I suggested that some such charge had been made in New York. He said he did not believe that there was any foundation for it, and that it was well known there that his wishes were that the office-holders should attend to the duties of their positions, and interfere neither with candidates nor election contests.

And here comes in the significant statement bearing upon the duty of Republicans in connection with these suspensions and removals from office:

> "My removals from office, such as are made," said he, "are made for cause. It would be absurd for me to undertake to give the country my reasons in all cases, because it would be impracticable. When I have removed a Republican for political reasons or for any other reasons, I would apply the same rule to my own party. I think the Republican Senators should be just enough to believe this of me. They ought to appreciate that I am trying to do my duty. Why they should continue to distrust me I do not see. They do not come to me either personally or by committee to get an understanding of my attitude, or to obtain explanations on points of action to which they object. They stand off and question the sincerity of my purposes."

The eight thousand six hundred and thirty-five fourth-class postmasters and the six hundred and forty-three suspensions before the Senate and the thousands of changes in other Departments "are made for cause;" not for political reasons merely; but to give those who have been so removed the opportunity to explain or defend themselves would be "absurd" and "impracticable."

But this is not all. Later in the winter the Civil Service Commission was reorganized, and in a newspaper printed in this city appeared a statement alleged to be "personal," and included in quotation marks, and which it is commonly reported was in the handwriting of the President:

> I can not rid myself—

He said, after speaking about the personnel of the Civil Service Commission—

> I can not rid myself of the idea that this civil-service reform is something intended to do practical good and not a mere sentiment invented for the purpose of affording opportunity to ventilate high-sounding notions and fine phrases.

He alludes to the action of the Civil Service Commission about a weigher in the city of Brooklyn, and says:

> When the Civil Service Commission consulted with me as to the status of Mr. Sterling and the true construction of the rule bearing upon that subject, I agreed with them in their second opinion that the position of weigher was subject to an examination, and that it should be filled by one who by means of a proper examination under the law proved himself competent and eligible. But it seemed to me that the good of the service required that the person to be appointed should be possessed of certain traits and qualifications which no theoretical examination would develop. One having in charge two or three hundred men of the class with which a weigher has to deal should possess personal courage, energy, decision, and firmness of character. It is entirely certain that the possession of such qualifications could not in the least be determined by the result of an examination organized for the purpose of testing an applicant's knowledge and education.

And he closes:

> No cause can gain by injustice or by a twisting of its purposes to suit particular tastes. And when a result is fairly reached through the proper operation of methods adopted to further a reform, it should be accepted—especially by the friends of the movement. They should not permit those of whom they require submission to say, with any semblance of truth, that they themselves submit only when the result accords with their views.

This closes the public declarations of the President of the United States upon the views which he entertains as to the method and plan and system upon which the public service is to be conducted under his administration. There are some interesting details as to the practical effects and results of the effort of the administration to purify the public service, which I would be glad if I had time to refer to, but I believe I will forbear. I can only say that it seems from an inspection of the record as if the cry "put the rascals out" had been changed in effect to "put the rascals in." Of course, Mr. President, no party is exempt from accidents, no organization has a monopoly either of good men or of bad men, and in calling attention to the results of civil-service reform as applied to this administration, I should be insincere if I were to assume that such results had followed from any predetermined purpose to put had men into office.

We heard a great deal during the campaign about the corruptions, profligacy, misdeeds, and maladministration of Republican officials. I can only say that in view of what has occurred under this administration, if I were inclined to be uncharitable I could with entire propriety say that while the Republican party was in power it endeavored whenever it detected crime anywhere to punish it; but one of the practical results of Democratic administration has been the reverse, and that is to place in office a very large number of admitted and convicted felons. I have before me a selection from which I will, I believe, in support of this view of the case, give a law extracts, stating in advance that these compilations are made from Democratic newspapers which, of course, is a mitigation of the slander, though it does not necessarily destroy its credibility.

Mr. ———, of Baltimore, who was made an Indian inspector in 1885, had been involved in notorious election frauds and was condemned by the civil-service reform Independents of Maryland as a companion of Higgins, as a ballot-box stuffer, and a professional gambler.

The postmaster at Sioux City, Iowa, was convicted and sentenced in Dakota for violation of the pension laws. The man who was removed to make a place for this eminent civil-service reformer had eight months yet to serve, and there was no complaint against him even to the extent that he was an offensive partisan.

Mr. Holmes, a postmaster in Mississippi, had been involved in notorious election-fraud scandals.

Mr. Shannon, appointed postmaster at Meriden, Miss., was the editor of the Mercury newspaper, which after President Grant's death contained a rabid editorial attacking the general's character, and he had been indicted in the United States court for "unlawfully and criminally conspiring with many others for the evasion of the civil-rights law."

In Rhode Island a Democratic postmaster was appointed who had been in the preceding three months arrested nine times for violation of the liquor law.

In Pennsylvania a man was appointed in the Philadelphia mint who openly confessed to writing a forged letter from Neal Dow to be used in influencing the German vote in the State of Ohio the preceding year.

There have been some strange things done in Maine. I almost hesitate to quote this, but if I am wrong the Senators from that State will undoubtedly correct me. It is alleged that the postmaster in the town of Lincolnville was at the time of his appointment actually in the Portland jail, where he was serving a term for a misdemeanor.

An agent by the name of Judd, who was appointed in the Bureau of Labor Statistics, was, upon inquiry as to the fact whether he had been a horse-thief and served in the penitentiary, suspended from office. The writer states that the only ground for supposing that he was not a horse-thief arose from the fact that they do not put men in the penitentiary for stealing horses out West; that if he was alive it was a reasonable, natural conclusion that he had not stolen any horses. Nobody denied the penitentiary.

A gentleman named Richard Board, of Kentucky, was appointed in July, on the recommendation of Comptroller Durham, clerk in the railway mail service and assigned to duty in New Mexico. This is under the Postmaster-General, who found leisure between removing postmasters every fifteen minutes to appoint this man in another branch of the service where he incautiously mentioned to his friends something about his previous history, and it appeared that he had been three times arrested in Cincinnati for obtaining money under false pretenses, that he had been twice arrested for stealing in Kentucky, and once in Texas—a variegated and diversified career. "No pent-up Utica" contracted his powers. He had stolen in three States. His father was a very wealthy man in high standing who had spent a great deal of money to protect his son, and through him he secured the indorsement of Comptroller Durham, and after he had been in service for a few weeks he committed a number of robberies, stole $163 from the money-order service, and at the date of this communication was lying in jail at Santa Fé awaiting trial.

It appears that in Cincinnati, under the surveyor of that port, a great many irregularities occurred, and a special agent named Williams was sent out to make an investigation, and he reported that all the charges against the persons who had been appointed were correct, but that the men seemed to have reformed and were at all events trying to do better, and it was not advisable to disturb them. The charges were like these: The janitor of the money-order division in the post-office at Cincinnati was a man who had confessedly served three years in the penitentiary for highway robbery.

Mr. PAYNE. That postmaster is a Republican, and he has not been removed.

Mr. INGALLS. I dare say at that time; but we are talking about the janitors.

The assistant custodian of the post-office building, who has forty employés under him, had the distinguished record of two terms in the work-house and one sentence suspended over him for future consideration. A confessed murderer, who had killed his man and escaped because of the absence of the prosecuting witness, was found to have been appointed as watchman in the same building by the surveyor.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is the Senator from Kansas speaking still of the Cincinnati post-office?

Mr. INGALLS. No, the Democratic surveyor.

Mr. VOORHEES. I call attention to the fact that there has been no change of postmaster at Cincinnati; a janitor is pre-eminently under the control of the postmaster, and the thief, if he is there, is under the control of a Republican postmaster.

Mr. INGALLS. Now the Senator from Indiana is wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason, because I assure him that the janitor of that public building is not appointed by the postmaster. He is under the control of the Treasury Department. I shall be glad to continue the debate if the Senator desires.

Mr. VOORHEES. Upon the recommendation of the postmaster always.

Mr. INGALLS. The collector of the port.

Mr. VOORHEES. On the recommendation of the postmaster he is in the building.

Mr. INGALLS. Another Ohio appointment—and I call the attention of our friend the junior Senator from that State to this—by the name of Jack Conelly, who was appointed statistical agent of the Agricultural Department upon the recommendation of ex-Congressman Converse and of Barger, the present pension agent at Columbus—is he a Republican?

Mr. PAYNE. No, he is a Democrat.

Mr. INGALLS. I should not have asked that question, because I see it states afterward that he was "chairman of the Democratic State committee." Conelly "has a record of imprisonment in the Lake County, Ohio, jail for stealing a promissory note, and he escaped being sent to the penitentiary because it was shown that the promissory note being worth less than its face value the offense was not grand larceny."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). The Chair informs the galleries that better order must be preserved. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. INGALLS. With great pleasure.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the Senator be good enough to state his authority?

Mr. INGALLS. A Democratic newspaper. I forget the name of it. The name of the man is Jack Conelly. I ask the Senator if he knows him?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will please suspend.

Mr. INGALLS. I can not hear the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know the man.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must appeal to Senators as well as to the galleries to be a little more silent so that the Senator from Kansas may be heard.

Mr. INGALLS. I would ask the Senator from Ohio if he knows a man named Brady, appointed postmaster at Newark, Ohio?

Mr. PAYNE. I do.

Mr. INGALLS. Is he a Democrat?

Mr. PAYNE. He is a Democrat.

Mr. INGALLS. He is charged with being an embezzler while deputy sheriff, and the case is now in the courts. Is that a true bill?

Mr. PAYNE. I do not know anything about it. He has recommendations here which state that he is a most respectable man.

Mr. INGALLS. In view of this record that I have read, the following quotation from the speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] has an interesting significance:

This man—

Speaking about a postmaster—I think it was about where the colloquy with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] occurred in his speech—

This man, with this shameful record, was recommended to be retained in office by the leading politicians of the Republican party because his services were regarded as important for the success of his party. He was dismissed under a Republican administration, but upon these recommendations of his value to his party he was reinstated by that administration, which was some years before this letter was written.

The Senator proceeded to state that, although this official was a confessed and admitted defaulter, known to be such to the Department, the President was unwilling to remove him because he did not want to transmit his reasons for his action to the Senate! That is an illustration of the logical result of the doctrine upon which the opposition rely in their arguments against the demand which has been made by the Judiciary Committee that official papers, documents bearing upon these questions, shall be sent down to the Senate whenever deemed to be necessary and important in the consideration of the matter.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] yesterday took occasion to advert with somewhat of animated hilarity to the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa about the evolutionary condition of the Democratic party, and dwelt with considerable unction upon a term that the Senator from Iowa had applied to the Democracy in his very able and interesting speech; "a protoplasmic" cell, and the Senator then proceeded to give us the definition of the term as it appears in the dictionaries, and suggested that if those facts had been known at the time when the canvass was pending Mr. Cleveland would undoubtedly have been counted out in New York.

The Senator from Iowa might have gone further in his application of the doctrine of evolution with much propriety. Geology teaches us that in the process of being, upward from the protoplasmic cell, through one form of existence to another there are intermediary and connecting stages, in which the creature bears some resemblance to the state from which it has emerged and some to the state to which it is proceeding. History is stratified politics; every stratum is fossiliferous; and I am inclined to think that the political geologist of the future in his antiquarian researches between the triassic series of 1880 and the cretaceous series of 1888 as he inspects the jurassic Democratic strata of 1884 will find some curious illustrations of the doctrine of political evolution.

In the transition from the fish to the bird there is an anomalous animal, long since extinct, named by the geologists the pterodactyl, or the winged reptile, a lizard with feathers upon its paws and plumes upon its tail. A political system which illustrates in its practical operations the appointment by the same administration of Eugene Higgins and Dorman B. Eaton can properly be regarded as in the transition epoch and characterized as the pterodactyl of politics. It is, like that animal, equally adapted to waddling and dabbling in the slime and mud of partisan politics and soaring aloft with discordant cries into the glittering and opalescent empyrean of civil-service reform.

The President closes his recent message to the Senate in this language:

> The pledges I have made were made to the people, and to them I am responsible for the manner in which they have been redeemed. I am not responsible to the Senate, and I am unwilling to submit my actions and official conduct to them for judgment.
> There are no grounds for an allegation that the fear of being found false to my professions influences me in declining to submit to the demands of the Senate. I have not constantly refused to suspend officials, and thus incurred the displeasure of political friends, and yet willfully broken faith with the people for the sake of being false to them.
> Neither the discontent of party friends nor the allurements constantly offered of confirmations of appointees conditioned upon the avowal that suspensions have been made on party grounds alone, nor the threat proposed in the resolutions now before the Senate that no confirmations will be made unless the demands of that body be complied with, are sufficient to discourage or deter me from following in the way which I am convinced leads to better government for the people.

He is not responsible to the Senate, nor is the Senate responsible to him; both are alike responsible to the people. But in the cases at bar we are compelled to inquire, in justice to the people, whether those pledges have been redeemed, or whether they have been broken, violated, and disregarded. Had the patronage of the Government, within proper limits, been turned over for its exercise to the party intrusted with power by a majority of the people there could have been no complaint, but upon the assurances that I have read the declaration was made that in every case where an incumbent was competent and qualified he should remain in office till the expiration of his term.

When, therefore, some were suspended and others were left, what is the irresistible inference, after the declarations of the President, except that these persons were suspended for cause either affecting their personal integrity or their official administration? Upon the ground, then, of personal justice, if no other, we are entitled to know whether wrong has been done by the accusations that have been filed in the Departments, so that we may protect those who are unable to defend themselves from injustice and defamation.

But there is another reason, and to me a still more convincing reason, why we should be advised in the case of these suspensions what are the papers, the official documents, and the reports on the files of the Departments affecting the administration of these offices, and that is this: under the tenure-of-office act, every official suspended is reinstated by the provisions of section 1768 of the Revised Statutes, if the Senate adjourns without confirming the designated person, and continues to exercise and discharge the duties of that office until he is again suspended by the President. Therefore, in acting upon these cases we have a double duty to perform; in the first place, to decide whether the person suspended was properly suspended, and, in the next place, whether he is a competent person to be restored to office under and by virtue of the operation of the statute under which he was suspended. If he is not a competent person then he ought not to be restored, and we can not determine whether he is competent and qualified and fit to discharge the duties of that office until we have the official declarations and statements upon which the action of the President was based.

Since this debate began there are indications that the President has become convinced that his position is untenable, and that he has concluded to yield to the reasonable requests of the Senate and relieve suspended officials from the otherwise inevitable imputations upon their conduct and character. I find the following correspondence in one of the metropolitan journals, which if authentic relieves the relation between the President and the Senate of the principal restraint:

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE, UNITED STATES SENATE, March 17, 1886.

DEAR SIR: Will you please advise the Committee on Finance whether or not there are any papers or charges on file reflecting against the official or moral character of ——, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of ——, suspended?

If there are any such papers or charges will you please communicate their nature and character to the committee?

Very truly, yours,

JUSTIN S. MORRILL.

Hon. DANIEL MANNING,
Secretary of the Treasury.

MARCH 19, 1886.

SIR: Your communication on behalf of the Finance Committee of the Senate, dated March 17, 1886, asking whether or not there are any papers or charges on file reflecting against the official or moral character of ——, late collector of internal revenue for the first district of ——, suspended, is received.

In reply thereto I have the honor to state that, so far as this inquiry relates to a suspension from office, I feel bound by the rules laid down in the President's recent message to the Senate upon the general subject of such suspensions.

But in order that I may surely act within the requirements of the statute relating to the furnishing by this Department of information to the Senate, I beg leave to remind the committee that the office referred to has no fixed term attached to it, and to further state that the President is satisfied that a change in the incumbency of said office will result in an improvement of the public service, and that the policy of the present administration will be better carried out by such change.

Except as the same may be involved in these considerations, no papers containing charges reflecting upon the official or moral character of the suspended officer mentioned in your communication are in the custody of this Department.

Respectfully, yours,

D. MANNING, Secretary.

Hon. JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance.

But whether this be true or not, this is not the forum in which this controversy is to be ultimately decided. The Executive is not on trial before the Senate; the Senate is not on trial before the Executive; but both, as to the sincerity of their professions and the consistency of their actions, are on trial before that greater, wiser, and more powerful tribunal—the enlightened conscience of the people, from whose verdict there is neither exculpation nor appeal.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President the debate upon the pending resolutions will be regarded, I think, as among the great historical debates which have taken place in this body. Grave questions of constitutional power, affecting both the Executive and the Senate of the United States, have been handled with marked ability on both sides of the Chamber. The question of the President's power to remove from office any person holding his commission without asking the concurrence of the Senate has been affirmed not only by Senators upon the other side of the Chamber but by some upon this side.

But as this debate is reviewed I think the critical student will find that it has been most noticeable for one feature, and that is for the wide distance that has separated the combatants who have been engaged in it. I have never seen a debate fought at so long range as this. The question of the power of the President to remove from office, as was said by the Senator from Vermont in opening this debate, is not involved in the discussion; and yet all these days have been largely consumed in discussing that question. Precedents and authorities have been industriously sought out and arranged by Senators on the other side of the Chamber to support the proposition of the President's unfettered power of removal from office—a question which I reassert is not involved in the consideration of the resolutions before the Senate. The question is not involved because the President has removed no one from office; he does not profess to have removed a single officer from his office.

Would it not be well, then, if those who maintain his power to do so would await the time when he exercises that power, and then rally to his defense? It will be time enough when the Senate receives from the Executive a message announcing a removal to bring on that discussion. It will be time enough for his adherents and defenders here to assert his power to remove when he has once asserted it himself. He only can make the issue; his champions upon this floor can not raise it. It rests with the President to present that issue to the Senate and to the country. He has not chosen to do so, and I submit that those who have come to the defense of his prerogative of removal have come uninvited and into a contest that is not joined. The gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber in this debate have with elaboration constructed their fortress and mounted their guns, but the fortress and the artillery that they have set up stand in the same relation to an adversary as that described by Washington Irving and constructed by one of the celebrated Dutch soldiers of New York, who, when he had built his fort and mounted his guns, Irving says, found that it frowned upon an absent enemy.

As was said in the opening of the debate, and as has been repeated by almost every Senator who has spoken from this side of the Chamber, the President himself not once, not one day, but every day since the Senate has been in session has by solemn message over his own signature affirmed that the provisions of the tenure-of-office act were binding upon his conscience and upon his conduct. Why not then come to the point where the strife is joined?

Let me call attention again to the exact form which the action of the President takes in the suspension and in the nomination of officers. If you go to the Departments, if you go to the committee-rooms of the Senate, you will find a jacket about every case of suspension, upon which there is a printed form, which, when the suspension is made, is filled up and signed by the President. No commission is issued to the person designated to discharge the duties of the suspended officer, but upon the jacket of each case you will find this form:

I designate A B to perform the duties of postmaster at ——, county of ——, State of ——, in place of ——, suspended under the provisions of the seventeen hundred and sixty-eighth section of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

So all these cases come to us here. The President does not pretend to have removed; he says, "I have suspended." The officer who held the previous commission is still an officer, suspended temporarily from the discharge of his duties and another designated to take them up; but no lawyer on this floor or anywhere else has contended or can contend that there has been a removal.

In case the President desires to remove an officer during the session of the Senate, what is the form in which he addresses us? This is the form:

I nominate A B to be postmaster at ——, county of ——, State of ——, vice C D, whose removal for cause is hereby proposed.

Does any defender of the administration here assume that Mr. Cleveland in such a case has removed the officer? It is known to every one throughout the country that A B, whose removal he proposes, continues to exercise the office until the Senate by confirming the designated successor consummates the removal.

I was surprised the other evening, in that little debate which seemed for a time to bring the contestants to close quarters, at the suggestion of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], that this message meant that the President proposed to remove the officer—not that it was a proposition to the Senate to be consummated only by the confirmation of the designated successor, but that it was simply a gratuitous, superfluous, and unnecessary announcement of the President that he proposed to remove the officer. In fact the message carries the announcement to us that the President does not intend to remove him. If the power of removal exists, if he means to assert it, then these nominations, these messages would come to us in this form: "vice A B, whom I have removed." I repeat, whenever the President is advised and consents to make that issue with the Senate, much that has been said by gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber will be pertinent to the debate; but until that time it has no pertinency, and the resort to it is a confession of an unwillingness to come to the real questions of policy and of administration which are involved in this discussion.

In the President's recent message, speaking of the law of 1867, which required the President to transmit his reasons for a suspension, he says, in substance, "If that law were in force I would obey it," showing that he submits himself to the provisions of the tenure-of-office law and does not challenge its constitutionality. Under that law I do not see how any man can doubt that in the case of a suspended officer, or in the case of an officer nominated in place of another whose removal is proposed, the concurrence of the Senate is an essential, necessary, and effective part of the act of removal. The officer is not removed until the Senate acts in either case. He is an officer until by the confirmation of his successor we change the office and place it in other hands, and that quite as strictly in law while he is suspended from the exercise of its functions as while he is in their actual discharge.

The question then is clearly one with which we have to do. We are asked by the President to do an act which removes a man from office; and will any one insist that we are not entitled to all needful information; that we may not rightly consider that which is the constitutional and legal result of our act; that we must shut our eyes to the question whether there has been cause for suspension, whether the office has been mismanaged, whether the man who previously held it has been recreant to official trust—that we must close our eyes to all these questions when his removal from office is that which we are asked to consummate in the one case, and is, in the other case, the direct consequence of what we are asked to do?

It has been said that the tenure-of-office act has been out of use. I shall not attempt to repeat the high-sounding terms in which the President conveyed to us this information. I have been in this body five years, and I affirm that the civil tenure-of-office law has never been out of use. I affirm, though my colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] declared the contrary yesterday, that a Republican Senate under a Republican President put it to the very use to which we are putting it now. I affirm that not once but many times (and if he will spur his recollection many of the instances will come to his own mind) has this same request for papers been made and complied with, and the Senate has considered upon the papers the question whether there was cause for removal. I can call cases to mind where just such information demanded by a Republican Senate of a Republican President influenced my action and vote upon nominations that were proposed to us.

It is not true, Mr. President. The fact is that the tenure-of-office law has been enforced; it has been a live force; it has been continually in mind in the administration of that part of our duty connected with the confirmation of officers nominated by the President.

But I want to look a little outside of the mere legal and constitutional questions which are presented here. I want to speak for a moment of the origin of this controversy. I wish to discuss it as an administrative policy, inaugurated by this administration, a policy that is without precedent and that will be without imitation, a policy of stimulating and receiving secret charges against the reputation of men, ay, as I shall show presently, not only against the reputation of men but against the reputation of women; of denying to the accused any access to or knowledge of the charges, and of acting upon those charges in the dark.

Let me say now that if the prompt and just demand, which was made in many cases by the incumbents of these offices when they were suspended under charges, to be advised of the character of those charges and to have an opportunity, however little it might influence the mind of the Executive, to place on file their ample refutation of the slanders and lies that had crept into the Departments against them—if that demand had been allowed, I must believe that most of the cases that are held up here would have been withdrawn or have gone through.

What was the attitude in which we found ourselves when we assembled here in December? In my own State the Republicans who were in office were willing at the mere suggestion of the administration to step out. Hundreds of them, besides those who took that course, would have placed their resignations in the hands of the administration but for the fact that their confidence was betrayed by the suggestion that if they had discharged their public duties conscientiously and well they might hold their offices until the end of their terms. Such was the proclamation. It went through all this country. Its exact terms have been given to the Senate by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

The President of the United States repeatedly put himself under pledge, not simply in his public utterances but in private letters, voluntarily written, in favor of such a policy. It went through all the land to those Republicans in office who had a fragment, small or large, of a legal term to serve, that if they had discharged their duties faithfully and honestly they would not be disturbed in serving out the residue of their term. It was said, as the Senator from Kansas has read, that mere difference in political opinion should not operate against the officer. It was said that if he had not made himself an indecent partisan the fact that he was a Republican should not be taken advantage of in order to deprive him of his office. It has turned out that it was a deceptive feast to which those gentlemen were invited. It was almost as full of deception and almost as fatal in its results as some of those feasts of old story to which men were invited for the purpose of assassination.

In many of these cases it leaked out in the community where the officer resided that charges had been filed against him. Some base fellows had been used for that unholy office, and being advised that charges had been sent the appeal was made to the heads of the different Departments, and I believe in many cases to the President himself, to be advised of the character of the charges made.

I do not know how free the access to papers in the public Departments may be to-day to a Senator who lays off his character as a committeeman, who unclothes himself as a Senator, and appears simply as a confidential friend of the head of one of the Departments. I do not know what he may learn under such circumstances; but I do know, if I have not been misinformed, that those records were closed against Democratic Senators and Congressmen last summer and fall. They were not allowed to examine those papers; they were kept in absolute secrecy. Here was an accusation, a hearing, a sentence, and an execution without the accused being advised of the character of the charges against him.

Our object is not to retain these offices. There is not a Democratic Senator who hears me who does not know that is not the motive actuating the Republican Senators. Though I understood my colleague yesterday to impute that purpose to the Republicans, I say there is not one who upon reflection, and upon recalling incidents which must be fresh in his memory in connection with the action of the Senate, does not know that if the removal is put simply upon the proposition that the administration wants a Democrat in a place held by a Republican, that the obstruction would be withdrawn. And that without any reference to the views which any of us may hold upon the subject of civil service; for however much I may differ from some of the utterances of the Senator from Kansas upon that subject, I do not believe that the Senate can enforce a civil service beyond the strict terms of the law upon a reluctant or unwilling President, and for one I should be unwilling to make obstruction with a view of accomplishing such an impossible end.

It has been said that this debate is concentrating the scattered and demoralized legions of the Democracy. It has been said that this issue is bringing the whole party to the support of the President; and yet they support the President upon a proposition that is not before the Senate, and, if I may judge by the approving smiles and nods which greeted the Senator from Kansas from the other side of the Chamber, upon this issue which he discussed, and about which I shall talk a little presently, the Democracy even in the Senate is by no means a unit in support of the President.

What is it these people ask? An honorable discharge after honorable service. That is all. They ask that they may go out of the offices to the duties of which they have devoted themselves with conscientious fidelity with an honorable discharge. They ask that they may go out of the offices in which they have so discharged the duties as to win the approval not only of their party friends, but of Democrats and even of Democratic newspapers, with an untarnished name; that it may be understood that they go out simply because the President wants a Democrat in; that will be accepted by all of them as an honorable discharge. I wish to know whether my Democratic friends have agreed that whatever may be their differences with the President upon civil service, or silver, or the tariff, or any of the great questions, however they may have been driven from him by his position on these great questions, whether they have all agreed to help him hold down the lid of the box in which these secret charges have been placed. It is a great issue upon which to unite a great party.

As I shall show presently, the Democratic party is not united upon that issue. As I shall show presently, Democratic newspapers and many Democratic Congressmen and Senators do not approve a policy that stimulates and invites charges against the character of men and women and hides those charges from the light of day. That is the issue, and great as the constitutional questions involved here may be, it is practically a greater question whether this Government in its civil service shall be administered as in a star chamber where accusations may be lodged and heard and decided without the knowledge of the man whose interests are to be affected and whose character is to be blackened.

I alluded a moment ago to the fact that Democratic Senators now and then had occasion in the administration of our duties here in connection with public office to find that charges had been lodged with committees of the Senate against their party friends who have been named by the President to discharge the duties of public office. There is probably scarcely a committee connected with this body that has not received charges against one or more of the persons whose nominations have been committed to it for consideration. It is true of my committee; it is true of every other committee that I know of. What do my Democratic friends think fair, then? What does my colleague think to be fair, then? That the committee shall give up to him or to his friends in Indiana the substance of the accusations in order that they may be transmitted to the person accused for his personal answer. How many Democratic Senators have already appealed to that fair and universal rule in the Senate, how many of them have gone to our committees, have inspected the charges made, have transmitted by letter to their friends accused the substance of the charges and have received in return from them evidence in their vindication, and have laid that before the Senate committees?

Mr. President, that, judged by your own conduct; that, judged by what you demand when your friend's character is assailed, is the fair rule. Will you unite here in support of a proposition which denies to a Republican removed knowledge of the charges that are filed against him in a public Department of this Government? I do not believe that there is a Senator on that side of the Chamber (if there is one I know it is not my colleague) who will rise and vindicate that course of administration. I know he reprobates it; I know every impulse of his heart cries out against it; I know he despises it, because he has been trained in his profession and in his intercourse with men to believe in the great doctrine that an accused should have the right to know of what he is accused and to be heard in his defense.

Is this the policy about which the Democratic party is to rally in support of President Cleveland? No, Mr. President, and it was largely because no Democrat on that side of the Chamber would venture to defend such a policy that the debate was shifted upon other grounds.

Yesterday in debate my colleague arraigned the Senate because he said we were condemning the Attorney-General unheard; and yet the accusation and the debate are public. He is heard here through his friends to present his side of this great controversy; and yet because no articles of impeachment had been presented so that he could be personally here to be heard, my colleague said it was an unfair trial. What does he think, then, of these trials that have been going on from day to day in the secrecy of the Postmaster-General's office with closed doors? These charges by the thousand are piled upon his table and he assorts them over, and without letting the persons accused know or have any intimation that they are accused at all, he deprives them of office and, so far as such a judgment can, of their good reputation.

My colleague said yesterday that the first feeling of the masses was for fair play. Does he think this is fair play? I answer for him, from my long knowledge of the generous impulses of his heart, that he does not. This is the great issue to the country. It is not the question of a few post-offices. I freely say to my colleague that the Republican party would be stronger in Indiana if you would put every Indiana Republican out of office, and I think the Democratic party would be weaker in precisely the same proportion that you put Democrats in.

The people may not understand this discussion of constitutional principles, but in every Anglo-Saxon heart, and especially in the Western heart, among the frontiersmen, who always believed in a fair fight, there is that imbedded sense of justice and fair play which resents and denounces these unfair methods. I happen to know that many manly Democrats in high place, when that policy was inaugurated, denounced it all over the city of Washington. I happen to know that there were some Democratic Congressmen who, when they were invited to become parties to this system of espionage, when it was suggested to them that they could not get a Democrat in office except they filed charges against the Republican holding the office, openly and boldly and frankly told the administration that they might keep the offices if Democrats could only get them at that disgraceful price. Is there any Senator who has filed such charges?

Mr. PLATT. Affidavits—sworn charges.

Mr. HARRISON. Many of them, as the Senator from Connecticut suggests, were affidavits, for enough has been furnished us by the administration in connection with nominations to advise us that affidavits containing sworn charges have, in many of these cases, been filed in the Departments. Is there a Democratic Senator here who will get up and confess that he filed any? Is there one? Is it not true, my friends, that whenever this is suggested to you you are prompt to say, "I never went into the business; I would not be guilty of filing such charges." Is not that true?

Is this the great issue upon which the Democrary is to be united? I affirm that there is not a Democrat who hears me—a member of this body—who will confess that he has become, or agree that he is willing to become, a party to this method of getting Democrats into office. It may be, though I would not impute such a motive to any Democratic Senator—I have thought sometimes that there might be gentlemen, connected with Congress possibly, or outside Democrats of influence, who had an interest in helping to hold down the lid of the box in which these secrets are buried, because if it were opened it would show that they had participated in this work.

I think there must be in these files a great deal of matter of which the President is ignorant, a great many confidential papers which he withholds from us that he has never seen himself. I am bound to believe that is true from the knowledge I have of the contents of some of them, or I am compelled to believe that he is utterly insincere in his public utterances as to his methods of administering the appointments to office.

In order to show that Democrats are not united in this policy of secret charges and secret trials, and of this obstinate refusal to give up either to the person accused or to the Senate the grounds of the accusations against Republican office-holders, I wish to read an article from the Washington Post, published last summer shortly after Mr. Vilas had issued his famous confidential circular. The Post, as we all understand, is the nearest Democratic organ to the President—the nearest geographically if not in his confidence. The article is the leading editorial and is entitled "An Appeal to Mr. Vilas:"

Has not the Postmaster-General by this time realized that his present method of turning out Republican postmasters is unpopular and objectionable? Nearly every leading paper in the country has reproduced, with comments more or less approving, The Post's vigorous protest against that grievous error.

There is some difference of opinion within the party—

That is, the Democratic party—

as to the civil-service and tenure-of-office laws; many think that the Republicans should be expelled and Democrats installed, simply on the merits of the situation and without any excuse further than was furnished by last November's election. The large majority of the people favor Mr. Cleveland's policy of respecting both laws and observing the spirit as well as the letter of both theories. These are differences which will adjust themselves and which may be safely left to time.

And I call attention to this utterance:

But we have yet to hear of a citizen of good repute who is willing to go on record as advocating the plan now pursued in the Post-Office Department. That plan, as we have already explained, is an invasion of the simplest and most fundamental rights of freemen. There is no criminal so base but, in this free country and enlightened age, is entitled to an impartial trial and an opportunity of self-defense. To know the character of his indictment, to be confronted by his accusers, and to enjoy the benefits of a hearing, these are privileges which the humblest may demand and must receive.

It is difficult to understand why Mr. Vilas gives his countenance to the star-chamber method of getting rid of Republican incumbents. That method is obnoxious to every conviction cherished by fair-minded men, and must be foreign and hostile to every instinct of his own nature. Even if he had suffered it to go into operation in the first instance without due reflection, he must perceive now how oppressive and unjust it is, and what cruel hardship it is capable of working.

* * * * * * * *

We are still hopeful, however, that when the Postmaster-General shall have considered the matter carefully in all its bearings, and taken note of the strongly and almost universally expressed disapproval of the plan, he will see the propriety of modifying it so as to make it agree with the spirit of our institutions and the rights of free citizens. A moment's reflection will show him that dwellers in the nineteenth century can not safely be subjected to the systems of the thirteenth; that secret condemnation of officials is as much an anachronism as would be the fagot or the rack. A day of reckoning must come in such a case as this. The Republican Senate, only too anxious for a pretext to antagonize the Democratic government, might not dare to make themselves obstructive in the face of a favorable feeling throughout the country; but, should the star chamber continue to flourish, they will have more than enough to justify them, and respectable public sentiment will applaud them in antagonizing an administration which countenances such things.

That is a Democratic utterance fresh upon the inauguration of this scheme of the secret assassination of character, and the editor concludes, whatever our friends may say about the President's right to remove from office, that the country will applaud a Republican Senate if it condemns such practices. Ah, Mr. President, how shall we condemn them except by using every constitutional power to drag out from these secret hiding places the charges that have been filed against worthy men and women? That is not the only Democratic paper that has spoken. My colleague [Mr. VOORHEES] knows the Indianapolis Sentinel to be the State organ of the party. I read a "special" to the Indianapolis Sentinel on June 23:

The Post assumes to be an organ of President Cleveland's administration and it is certainly characterized by both fairness and ability. In to-day's impression, however, it severely condemns the methods obtaining in certain Departments of the Government of preferring charges and passing sentence on incumbents without giving them an opportunity to be heard. "We wish to remark," says the Post, "that the practice has our cordial and enthusiastic disapprobation." These dispatches—

Continues the correspondent of the Sentinel—

"hitherto have attested aversion to anything inoculated with the revoltingly unjust proceedings of the star chamber. The views I have accepted and written—

And my colleague knows probably who this correspondent is—were gathered from the highest political talent in the country; but all my informants objected to being named as authority. The Post article concludes as follows.

And then he quotes the Post approvingly and adds:

Every sentiment emblazoned in the above I heard frequently from the acknowledged leaders of both political parties. The first impulse of many Democratic Congressmen was to let the rascals remain rather than execute the duty imposed by the order to prove a Republican office-holder guilty of a nameless crime. This espionage is an odious finale to what otherwise might be classed among the most splendid political achievements.

And then this correspondent proceeds:

The postmaster at Tipton, Stephen Lowley, and the postmaster at Seymour, Charley Means, both demand to be heard when charged with "offensive partisanship." One of them advised with General Gresham concerning the spirit of the law before assuming party obligations during the last campaign and he did nothing but what, in the opinion of then Postmaster-General, he clearly had a right to do. Stepen Lowley was commissioned a postmaster by Abraham Lincoln. While a very active political foe to the Democratic party, there are hundreds of Democrats who would be unwilling to see him thrust out of an office he has so long and impartially administered under the imputation of a crime of uncertain meaning. If "offensive partisanship" means hostility to the party that elected Cleveland, Mr. Lowley is guilty. If it means something corrupt or indirect in the management of the Tipton postoffice, Mr. Lowley is falsely accused, and a large majority of the life-long Democrats of his neighborhood will resent any imputation cast upon him.

I have another extract from a Democratic paper. Recently, in the town of Columbus, in the State of Indiana, a postmaster has been made, and it happens to be the editor and proprietor of this paper from which I am now about to read. In his issue of July 10, which was before he became postmaster (I have not seen the paper since, I think), he says:

With all due respect to the President, we believe he has made a mistake in requiring the people to become parties to an espionage upon the political conduct of their neighbors.

And he concludes:

In other words, the Republican officials should "go" because they are Republicans. This they could not object to, and this would require no inquisitorial proceedings on the part of their neighbors and social friends. "Offensive partisanship" is a mistake.

In another issue he says:

The universal sentiment—

And here is a newspaper in a strongly Democratic section of the State speaking for Democratic sentiment.

The universal sentiment almost among Democrats is in opposition to the "offensive partisan" idea of President Cleveland.

Mr. President, we have in Indianapolis a few very respectable and influential men, for their number, who belong to the Mugwump persuasion and supported Mr. Cleveland with great earnestness. They have a little paper there called the Freeman. The persons connected with it are connected with the civil-service-reform organization in Indiana. This is what the Freeman says about this policy:

A place is wanted for some camp-follower. Of course it must be forthcoming. But Vilas has said that no one will be removed unless charges be preferred. So some convict, or gutter-snipe, is hired to blacken the character of a man who is unfortunate enough to hold the coveted place. When he is bounced he tries to find out what is the reason for it, and he is told that he can't be allowed to see the charges or to be faced by his accuser.

He goes out under a cloud of suspicion.

We say this is outrageous. It is one of the fundmental rules of Anglo-Saxon liberty that every man shall be entitled to a fair trial. And this swearing away the character of American citizens can not be apologized for by the warmest friend of the administration.

Now I want to supplement what I have said about the general policy of stimulating, suggesting, receiving charges against men in office and refusing them a hearing by some individual instances of injustice.

The postmaster at Shelbyville, Ind., was a soldier who had served his country for four years. When the shock of war broke upon this land, when treason took the field, this man, rallying with thousands of other Indianians under the flag of his country, stepped, not into a place of ease and emolument, but into the bloody front of battle, and for four years on dreary marches, in dangers of battle, in the weariness of hospital, his brave heart in every place to which he was called gave its best service to the defense of the country and the honor of the flag. It happened that in recognition of this he held the postoffice at Shelbyville, and had held it acceptably, not only to his Republican friends, but, as I shall show you upon the testimony of the Democratic newspaper, he had discharged his office creditably and to the satisfaction of all. Last summer he was suspended from office. It was understood through the town that some charges had been presented against him. The men who made them did not disclose themselves, and he could gather at home no intimation as to their character. Whether they affected his personal integrity, whether they charged a maladministration of the office, or whether he was simply charged with being a Republican he could not tell. He sat down and addressed the Postmaster-General a letter, asking in the most respectful way to be advised of the character of the charges against him. He got no answer. Need I add that? Who did get any answer? Failing to get an answer from the Postmaster-General, he addressed me this letter:

SHELBYVILLE, IND., July 7, 1885.

DEAR SIR: It is reported in the newspapers that I have been suspended as postmaster at this place and Squire L. Major has been appointed. On the 8th day of June, 1885, I wrote to the Postmaster-General concerning alleged charges, as follows:

DEAR SIR: It is currently reported that charges have been preferred against me as postmaster of this place. If such is the case will you be kind enough to inform me of the nature of said charges and oblige a comrade.

Yours, respectfully,

A. P. BONE, Postmaster.

WILLIAM F. VILAS, Postmaster-General,
Washington, D. C.

He was writing to a soldier, a soldier now exercising a high office, a soldier who was his superior, a soldier who held his destiny and character in his hand, and he signs himself—

A comrade.

He continues to me:

I have never received any answer to this letter, although it was plainly due to me from a Government officer and a brother soldier. Since my suspension rumor informs me of the nature of the charges. If rumor is accurate then I have to say the charges are outrageously false and malicious. No one has, to my knowledge, been sent here to investigate these charges, and I have not only been kept in ignorance of their character, but have not been allowed to defend myself, a privilege which is guaranteed to the vilest criminal in all civilized nations.

I desire to know the nature of the charges and to meet my accuser face to face.

That man had been a soldier. He had met his country's accusers face to face, and had looked into their eyes with undaunted heart.

That I have done my whole duty as an officer the records of the Department will prove, and I know that I give satisfaction to the patrons of the office irrespective of party.

The following is a clipping from the Democrat of yesterday, July 7.

Let me read simply the closing paragraph of it:

Mr. Major, we believe, will make an excellent official, but it will require much labor on his part to excel in efficiency Mr. A. P. Bone, who has held the position so long.

I now conclude the letter:

The Democrat is owned and edited by W. Scott Ray, a prominent Democrat politician and the president of the Democratic State Editorial Association.

Please ask the Postmaster-General for a copy of the charges that have been preferred against me.

And oblige, yours, truly,

A. P. BONE, Postmaster.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON.

Upon that letter I wrote on the 9th day of July, 1885, this indorsement:

[Indorsement.]

INDIANAPOLIS, IND., July 9, 1885.

Respectfully referred to the honorable Postmaster-General. I hope you will not deny the request of Mr. Bone to be advised of the character of any charges filed against him, and to have an opportunity to meet them. The slip he incloses from the Democrat newspaper shows how good an officer he has made, and this good civil record, with a long and gallant service in the war for the Union, entitles him, I think, to a favorable consideration of his request.

B. HARRISON, United States Senator.

Not only this soldier's appeal to know but my appeal in his behalf went unanswered from the Post-Office Department and remains unanswered to this day. Thinking that possibly there might have been some failure to receive the answer, I addressed the Postmaster-General on the 20th instant, asking a copy of the letter of Bone to me with my indorsement, and of any reply which he had sent to either of us. This is his reply:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 20th instant, stating that on the 9th of July you forwarded me with your indorsement a letter from A. P. Bone, late postmaster at Shelbyville, Ind., and requesting to be furnished a copy of said letter and of your indorsement, and also a copy of any reply that was made by me to you or Mr. Bone; and in response I return you the original letter of Mr. Bone with your indorsement, which you may return as you shall desire; and further state that I have not preserved in my letter-book a copy of my letter of acknowledgment to you or to Mr. Bone, if I wrote him.

Very respectfully, yours,

WM. F. VILAS, Postmaster-General.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON,
United States Senator.

While we are talking about rallying around the administration, I want to know if there is a Democrat who approves of that? I want to know if there is a Democratic Senator here who approves of that sort of treatment of a citizen? I want to know if there is one who, much more, approves of that sort of treatment of a man who for four years fought for his country in the hour of its pressing danger. If the Democratic party means to unite upon this issue and in defense of these practices, then I welcome the issue.

Mr. President, I have another case. I do not know how it may seem to the Senate, but to me it is infinitely full of pathos and indignation. Down on the Ohio River in one of our Indiana counties is the town of Cannelton. The post-office there is of the fourth class, and I regret it exceedingly, because it withdraws from our consideration here the case to which I am about to refer. Isabella De la Hunt was the widow of Major De la Hunt, of the Twenty-sixth Indiana Volunteers. He was a Democrat, a Democrat before the war, a Democrat during the war, and a Democrat after the war, or after his return from the Army. He was a gallant man. At Prairie Grove in Arkansas he was shot down by a wound entirely through the body. Recovering from this desperate wound, he rejoined his command and again received a rebel bullet through his arm. Disabled by these two wounds received in his country's service, he was compelled to leave the Army and return to Perry County, Indiana. In acknowledgment of his Democracy, in recognition I may hope of his gallant service as a soldier, the Democracy of Perry County elected him to one of the county offices. But his days were few. His vital forces had been so sapped by the wounds which he had received that it was not long until a sorrowing widow and one only child followed the remains of as brave a soldier as ever went out from Indiana to his last resting-place in the grave. This widow, left with small means, entered upon the work of maintaining herself and that soldier's orphan boy. For many years her old father was postmaster at Cannelton and she his principal and most efficient deputy. Something like a year or eighteen months ago, her old father being beyond eighty years of age and unable to discharge the duties of the office, Isabella De la Hunt, the widow, was appointed on my request by Mr. Hatton, then Postmaster-General, to this little post-office.

If there was in all this country one person who by reason of her sex, who by reason of her widowhood, who by reason of the sacrifice she had made in giving the arm on which she leaned to her country's service, was entitled to be kept in office, was entitled to have her reputation guarded jealously and by all men who represented the Government, it was Isabelle De la Hunt. Fearing, however, that some person might be mean enough to misrepresent her for the sake of obtaining this little office, she wrote to the honorable Postmaster-General in March last expressing her apprehension and asking him in case charges should be made against her to do her the favor of giving notice thereof, so that she could refute them, and also informing him of her husband's service, death, of her financial necessities, and the further fact of her husband's politics.

Mrs. De la Hunt was removed, and neither to that appeal nor to a later appeal to know the character of the vile charges that had been preferred against her was she given the simple recognition of an answer. I want to read now to the Senate what she says:

I have just received from Hon. JOHN J. KLEINER, Representative in Congress from this district, the following letter, which explains itself:

POST-OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., August 28, 1885.

MADAM: Yours of the 24th, relative to the P. O. case in C., is at hand. Evidence deemed sufficient to cause your removal has been filed, and your removal was ordered on account of partisanship shown in the conduct of the office during the campaign just closed.

With kindest regards, I remain yours, truly,

JNO. J. KLEINER.

MRS. ISABELLE DE LA HUNT,
Cannelton, Ind.

Now hear what the woman says:

SOMEBODY HAS LIED.

Had the Government seen fit to remove me without alleged cause, as it had an undoubted right to do, I should remain silent; but when I am sacrificed by falsehood I may be excused if I protest against it.

I have this to say, that whoever has sworn to any act of partisanship on my part in the conduct of the post-office here has committed willful perjury, and I dare him to appear before any open tribunal and make good his accusation. I call upon him to stand forth in the glare of honest sunlight and exhibit himself to this community as the author of this calumny. Let him do this and bring from the files of the star-chamber court at Washington the specifications to which he has affixed his infamous name, and I pledge myself to prove their utter falsity. So conscious am I of the rectitude and impartiality of my conduct in the discharge of my official duties that I do not hesitate to appeal to you, one and all, irrespective of your political preferences, for the truth of this assertion.

Somebody in this community has sworn to a lie to accomplish that which could not be done through the instrumentality of truth. For this I now publicly brand him as a perjurer. I do not propose to lie under the false accusations of any untruthful coward who thus resorts to secret assassination of character to accomplish an unjust object. Hence I appeal in this public manner to the honor and consciences of all honest men and women to condemn, as I know they must, this infamous attempt to do me an injury.

I say to the Government—take your post-office, but not under false pretenses. Do this, and I will utter no word of complaint, however unjust it may appear.

Excuse me, my friends, you who have known me from my childhood and are witnesses of my daily and official life—excuse me if I manifest some feeling over this wrong; I can not help it. War, with its natural and inevitable results, struck down my husband, my protector and support. It was the act of an open foe on the field of battle, whom I try to forgive; but that the Government, to preserve which he sacrificed his life, should connive with secret assassins and false witnesses to strike down his family without an opportunity of vindication is a national disgrace, and an act too cowardly and base for absolution.

ISABELLE DE LA HUNT,
Cannelton, Ind., August 31, 1885.

[Applause in the galleries.]

There was a woman in whose spirit we can see the inspiration of the gallant husband that she sent forth to fight. Is it about this case and in support of the Postmaster-General that the Democratic party will unite? Is it to justify an administration that refused a hearing to this dead soldier's widow that a demoralized and divided Democratic party is to assemble? Mr. President, there is not a Democrat who hears me, there is not a Democratic Senator here who would not scorn to be the author of such treatment. Let us understand then what we are justifying, let us know what the administrative policy is that we are to condone or to condemn by refusing to give these people the only opportunity they have to know what false accusers have said against them.

Mr. President, I ought to add one incident to that story, or it will not be complete. I am advised that the first recognition which the Post-Office Department extended to her was a letter dated November 17, 1885, from the office of the First Assistant Postmaster-General, signed "William Duff Haynie," as it is put here, and my informant says what position he fills does not appear from the letter. It was written in reply to her letter of complaint to the Postmaster-General concerning certain offensive allusions in a paper published by Mr. Underwood, who had been appointed to the office upon her removal, and in some way reflecting upon her. She made that complaint. I do not, of course, know what the newspaper was saying or how just the complaint was, but this person in reply alludes to the fact of her removal for offensive partisanship, and says the papers in her case were referred to him and that he thinks the charge was made out by an examination, as he says, of her own newspaper. That is the incident I wanted to mention. When Major De la Hunt died he was the owner of a little Democratic newspaper in Cannelton. It was a part of the little property that came to his widow. She was not able to run a newspaper, and she appealed to her brother-in-law, Judge Mason, to take charge of it and keep it alive for her until it could be sold. He did so, and finding it a little embarrassing for him, a Republican, to run a Democratic newspaper, he said to her, "There is one Democratic paper here, and if I run this paper for you I must change its politics;" and so for a few years, until it could be sold, Judge Mason conducted that paper for her as a Republican paper; but it had been sold, I am told, eight years before these charges of offensive partisanship based upon its editorials were filed.

Now, Mr. President, perhaps my distinguished friend from Kansas, whose command of language so far surpasses my own, might characterize this transaction, perhaps he could touch it up a little; but to me that work is impossible. The story of Mrs. De la Hunt carries its own pathos and its own indignation.

Mr. President, a Union soldier who went through the whole war with distinction had a little place as a railway mail clerk in Indiana. He had held the place for many years. He had a most exemplary and conspicuous record. I believe he never failed to make a trip when his turn came and that he was constantly ready to make extra trips when called on. There was no trouble about his record in the office of the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, none whatever, but he suddenly on a return trip received notice, on his arrival at Indianapolis, from the Postmaster-General that his services were no longer required. As well as I can ascertain, the most grievous offense that had been committed by this Republican was that he had charge of the artillery when my distinguished comrade and colleague here [Mr. LOGAN] came to visit Indianapolis during the last campaign. This railway clerk was off duty that week, and he had charge of the artillery, and helped fire the salute. He was an experienced man, and had performed that duty so much in the past, and always with such perfect safety to those who were with him, that he was selected on this occasion to welcome our distinguished candidate for the Vice-Presidency. Well, he was fired out for it [laughter] and who was put in his place? I am not going to try to supplement or complete the record of rascals appointed which the Senator from Kansas introduced—I am not looking for rascals; this case falls in my way. The man who was appointed was one Dowling, and there having been serious charges affecting his character, Mr. Swift, who was connected with the civil-service-reform association of Indianapolis, addressed the Postmaster-General on the subject, laying the charges before him.

Let me tell you what they were. It was said by several persons that on the streets Mr. Dowling, then a member of the city council of Indianapolis, had stated that he himself had bribed several other members of the council in the interests of a city corporation. He repeated this declaration in the hearing of a number of persons. The prosecuting attorney got hold of it and brought him before the grand jury and asked him to tell the jury whom he had bribed.

He said, in substance, "I will not answer that question; it would criminate me." The prosecuting attorney then wrote out the question, and, after having it certified, Mr. Dowling was brought into the criminal court of the county and the prosecutor said to the judge, I have propounded this question to this man in the grand-jury room and he declines to answer, and I submit to the court whether he shall not be compelled to answer. There again Mr. Dowling said he could not answer it without criminating himself, and the court excused him from answering. The city council took it up and charges were filed against him. It was voted that he was guilty of having confessed to an act of bribery. The council by a vote of 17 to 3 declared that Dowling had made his admission of bribery, and by a vote of 13 to 7 the same body held that he ought to be expelled; but there was not the two-thirds vote required, and so the proceedings failed.

There is another matter connected with this case that is full of interest and instruction. Mr. Swift laid all these facts before the Postmaster-General. It was not a matter of rumor and report. The facts were verified by official records from the criminal court of the county and from the records of the common council of the city. This case was made just as I state. Now hear what Mr. Vilas says when a Democrat is accused:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., September 14, ——.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 12th is received and contents noted. It is fair to any man who has been appointed, and since his appointment has continued in the service without complaint as to the manner of its performance from the officials over him, that he should have notice of such an accusation as you make, because inquiry might put a different complexion upon the case as you understand it. I intend by the remark no criticism upon your statement, but make it prefatory to the inquiry whether you are willing I should send your letter to Mr. BYNUM—in order to see what may be said on the other side.

The member of Congress who nominated Mr. Dowling—

I hope I shall ever be as willing to remove an unfit person when appointed by me as if he had been found in the service as I took it; and I shall do my utmost to render it as efficient as possible and free from bad men.

Please reply early.

Very truly, yours,

WM. F. VILAS, Postmaster-General.

Mr. Swift was not one of the sneaking kind, and he promptly wrote Mr. Vilas that he was at perfect liberty to lay his letter before the Congressman or anybody else, and that he would support the charges. He proceeded to support the charges, setting out under official certificates the proceedings of the court and of the council. What followed then? Was this man dismissed? No, Mr. President; they were advised that he had a good record in throwing mail matter and that under all the circumstances the Department thought they would not turn him out. But the noticeable incident here is that when a Democrat is accused upon evidence that is matter of public record, the Postmaster-General who would not answer Mr. Bone, a soldier of four years' service, to tell him what he was accused of, gives out that this accused Democrat should have notice of such an accusation as inquiry might put a different complexion upon the case; but it never struck his sapiency, it never struck this distributor of justice, that inquiry might put a different phase on Mrs. de la Hunt's case or on a hundred others that I could bring to the attention of the Senate. Or probably it did strike him that it would put a different phase upon the case, and that he would be compelled to reverse his action, as the Senator from Vermont suggests to me, and therefore in the case of Dowling he wants Dowling to know about it and be heard, and in the case of the soldier's widow the record is closed without her being advised of the charges against her. Is this the policy of fairness, is this the administration of public office as a public trust, upon which the Democratic party are now so eagerly rallying to the defense of this administration?

Mr. President, I must hope, as I must believe, that many of these things thus buried in the files of the Departments here are unknown to the President. I must believe it, for the contingency of not believing it is one that I will not willingly accept. I had a letter the other day from a wounded soldier. A few years ago my colleague introduced, I think in the Forty-seventh Congress, a resolution to which I may refer more in detail in a few moments if I have time, directing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire whether section 1754 of the Revised Statutes which pledges to disabled Union soldiers a continuance in public service had been enforced. Here is a letter from a twice-wounded soldier of the late war who was occupying the little place of a railway mail clerk running between La Fayette and Quincy, and suddenly, without warning, his name is stricken from the roll and he writes me to ascertain what he is charged with. I inquired of Mr. Jameson, the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, and this is his answer:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1886.

SIR: Yours of March 20, asking the reasons for the removal of W. H. Coon, late railway postal clerk between La Fayette, Ind., and Quincy, Ill., is at hand.

In reply permit me to say that there are no charges on file in this office that would in any way affect Mr. Coon's standing as a clerk or a citizen. It is therefore presumed that the Postmaster-General took the action he did for reasons satisfactory to himself and, it is supposed, of a political nature.

Very respectfully,

JNO. JAMESON,
General Superintendent.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRISON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

And so it is that, notwithstanding the provisions of the statute which my colleague under a Republican administration called to our attention, with results which he will perhaps recollect as well as I, this wounded soldier goes out simply for reasons satisfactory to the Postmaster-General, nothing against his record as a clerk, nothing against his record as a citizen. It is not even intimated that he has been guilty of doing more than that which every soldier fought for and brought home from war, the right freely and openly to express his political sentiments.

Mr. President, these are not picked cases; these are not isolated cases. They are mere hap-hazard selections from the great mass of such cases which have occurred all over this country, and which are familiar to every Senator and to every member of the House of Representatives. The President in his message said to us:

If in any degree the suggestion—

That is the suggestion of injustice being done to these officers—is worthy of consideration, it is to be hoped that there may be a defense against unjust suspension in the justice of the Executive.

I do not know whether in the pressure of greater affairs, if there can be any greater, the cries of these men and of these women have reached the President at all, but certain it is that justice has not been found for these, even that simple justice of being allowed to place upon the record a denial of these charges that when they have gone and some future intermeddler with confidential papers looks through these files, he may see as well the defense as the accusation.

The Senator from Vermont asks me when the President's justice is to come in. I suppose it is by erecting some oratorical monument over the graves of those who have been thus disposed of without ceremony. It must be in requiem or oratory. It seems to be too late for any other sort of justice.

Now, sir, as to the beneficent effects of this new policy, this new contest between civil-service reform and what Mr. Cleveland calls the old spoils system; and without now attempting to state my views of the civil service, I do lift up a hearty prayer that we may never have a President who will not either pursue and compel his Cabinet advisers to pursue the civil-service policy pure and simple and upon a just basis, allowing men accused to be heard, and deciding against them only upon competent proof and fairly—either have that kind of a civil service, or for God's sake let us have that other frank and bold, if brutal, method of turning men and women out simply for political opinion. Let us have one or the other. They will not mingle, and it was the conflict of these currents, the President on the one side endeavoring to be responsive to his self-imposed pledges and the pressure of his party on the other, that has driven those who were at the heads of the Departments in the attempt to preserve and maintain the President's professions and at the same time to give to the hungry who were demanding to be fed—it was the attempt to reconcile the irreconcilable that has brought about this wretched condition of things in which men and women are condemned without a hearing. Let us have one or the other, pure and simple.

May I supplement what the Senator from Kansas said by a general expression or two as to how the civil service has been going on in Indiana? Barney Conroy was a twice-convicted felon. He had not had the versatile character of the man to whom the Senator from Kansas referred who had stolen in three States. Barney Conroy had stolen and robbed only in Indianapolis, and in our criminal court there there were two records, one of a conviction for grand larceny and one of a conviction for larceny and robbery, and he had served two distinct terms of two years each in the penitentiary of the State. At our union depot where large mails are transferred there was a private soldier not conspicuous either in his relations or in his achievements, but just one of those faithful fellows who in war and in peace always did a man's duty quietly. He was in charge of the transfer of the mails and was turned out to make a place for Barney Conroy, the twice-convicted felon. I think I have here somewhere Barney's recommendations. My colleague escaped.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not hear my colleague's last observation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He said you were not one of his recommenders.

Mr. VOORHEES. Indeed I was not. It was a grave mistake, and was rectified the very moment it was found out. He staid there, I do not know how long, a few hours.

Mr. HARRISON. It was found out pretty soon and it was corrected. I have no idea that it was known to the gentlemen who signed the paper; it could not have been. It was signed by the governor, the secretary of state, the treasurer, and some of the supreme judges. I have no doubt they were imposed upon, and yet they certified in the paper that they knew him well and that he was an honest man and a most earnest Democratic worker. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. I know nothing of the terms of the recommendation. I am perfectly frank to say that it is a well-known case of a stupendous mistake in which the fellow held office for a little while; and were I permitted I could name—and possibly the time may come when I can retort by naming greater rascals than Barney Conroy, who staid in office a good deal longer than he did.

Mr. HARRISON. If my colleague can tell me now of a single case occurring in the State of Indiana within his knowledge where any man who had a record of conviction of an infamous crime was appointed to office by any Republican administration I should be glad to have him do it.

I do not refer to this case as typical. I say to my colleague that in the last campaign when the air was full of Democratic slanders that embraced all Republicans and the cry was abroad "turn the rascals out," in meeting that denunciation, as on every other occasion, I have said that personal honesty and honor were not divided upon party lines. This was the recommendation:

We, the undersigned, would most earnestly request of the proper person for making the appointment to appoint Bernard Conroy to the position of transfer agent for transferring the mails at the union depot, Indianapolis. We have known Mr. Conroy for a long time as an earnest worker in the cause of Democracy—one who is always at the polls early and late.

[Laughter]—

[Laughter.]

He is a hard-working, honest citizen, and as he has never before asked an appointment, we think him worthy of recognition now.

He got one, he got two, but he did not ask for them. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. Who signed that?

Mr. HARRISON. I will read the names, as my colleague asks it.

Isaac, P. Gray, governor; Oscar B. Hord; John G. Cooper, treasurer of State; S. P. Sheerin, clerk of the supreme court; W. E. Niblack, supreme judge.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The clerk kept the record, I suppose.

Mr. HARRISON. No, this case did not go to the supreme court; it was too plain. [Laughter.]

James H. Rice, auditor of State; Francis T. Hord, attorney-general; W. R. Myers, secretary of state.

Mr. VOORHEES. I did not know but that somebody had forged my name there.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I exculpated my colleague at the beginning. I said that he had escaped.

Mr. President, those are excellent gentlemen who signed that paper. They were filled with mortification when they found what they had done and how they had been imposed upon; and perhaps the best use of this incident here, after illustrating the liability that even Democrats are under when they pick a man who has been early and late at the polls, and has been an active Democrat, to get a rascal—after illustrating that fact, perhaps the best use of the incident is to show how utterly untrustworthy such indorsements are, how little dependence can be placed upon them.

But this incident and the Dowling incident, and I will not say what other incidents, because there are some cases I am not at liberty to comment upon now, carry important lessons and warnings. The Indianapolis Sentinel, the State organ of the Democratic party, has spoken upon this subject, and I shall now read the article, which is entitled "Halt," and is as follows. It is in the issue of January 26 last:

HALT!

With due respect we would suggest to the powers at Washington, and all others concerned therein, that the time has fully come when a halt should be called in the business of appointing unworthy characters to office in this State.

In our opinion the seeming attempt to rival the Republican party in making and maintaining bad appointments to office is an unworthy ambition, and the sooner it is abandoned the better.

The honest Democratic masses of the State have already been sufficiently humiliated—the grand old party of the people damaged quite enough, surely, for a halt.

With becoming modesty we would venture to suggest to the forces inspiring and controlling appointments here that there is no lack of honest, competent Democrats in our State. In view of this fact we confess to our inability to make out any sufficient reason for the selection and appointment of thieves, highwaymen, bribers, deadbeats, and the like. Give honest, competent Democrats a chance.

It may have been noticed by some of you that the other day the delegation from Indiana urged upon the President the appointment of Hon. John B. Stoll, of Indiana, to be Public Printer, and that they came away, according to the newspapers—doubtless it is not true—with a great deal of disgust when the President told them he did not intend to turn Mr. Rounds out. Mr. Stoll edits a Democratic newspaper. Hear him on the reform of the civil service, under this administration, in Indiana. He says:

There is more complaint at and around Indianapolis about the administration not "turning the rascals out" than anywhere else in the Hoosier Commonwealth. And yet no locality has rendered the turning-out process more odious than that same locality. Perjurers, deadbeats, ex-convicts, and reprobates generally are seemingly recommended to office with a good deal more zeal than the just claims of honorable and meritorious gentlemen are thought of being pushed. Such conduct is an outrage not only upon the administration but upon the Indiana Democracy. The politicians who foist that kind of cattle upon the public service ought to be exposed and held up to public scorn and indignation.

So that the difficulty of finding honest men for office is one which the Democracy are now experiencing. And now to turn from the grave to the gay, this non-partisan civil-service administration has turned Republicans out because they were on committees, or published newspapers, or took some active part in campaigns. A friend of mine sent me the other day this post-office heading; it is a little post-office in Greene County, Indiana.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A Democratic post-office at the present time?

Mr. HARRISON. I suppose so. He was appointed on the 20th of July, 1885, and I believe no Republican has been appointed since that date. The printing is as follows:

James H. Quillin, P. M. Post-office at Lyons, Greene County, Indiana.

On this side [exhibiting] is a picture of Cleveland and Hendricks, with the words under it "Our benefactors." [Laughter.] I suppose the possessive pronoun refers to the postmasters and not to the public generally. Some Republican postmasters were, I understand, convicted of offensive partisanship, and turned out because during the last campaign they had a picture of the Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, our candidate for the Vice-Presidency, displayed in the office. That was thought to evince offensive partisanship, and without being allowed to prove whether it was a likeness or not they were turned out. [Laughter.] There were some of those campaign pictures of General LOGAN that I think a man might have raised an issue on. [Laughter.] But here a Democratic postmaster is not guilty of offensive partisanship when he puts on a post-office letter-head the name of the Democratic President and Vice-President with the legend "Our benefactors." The Postmaster-General's head ought to have been on there, because that is a fourth-class post-office. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, again, I want to see how thorough and sincere this reform idea of turning men out because they are partisans is—how it is illustrated by what is being done by the men who have been turned in. I find this notice: Mr. Sparks is the editor and publisher of a Democratic paper at Mount Vernon, Ind., and has been nominated for postmaster. In an editorial article from his paper, which I have here, he compliments his predecessor very highly for discharging the duties of his office, but it is not to that point that I am coming. This notice appears in his paper with a large heading:

NOTICE.

Having assumed the duties of postmaster of this city of Mount Vernon, Ind., it will be necessary for me to remain in the post-office during business hours. Therefore, persons desiring to see me on special business connected with the Democrat will please call at the post-office.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to suppose a case. I do not know just what the rules are, and for fear I shall trench upon things that are confidential I am going to suppose a case. Suppose a postmaster of the Republican faith who had held and exercised the duties of postmaster for a long series of years faithfully and in a way that brought the commendation of all men of both parties, so faithfully that when his last term expired and the question of his reappointment came up, though he had been in office twelve years, not a man applied for the office, but everybody conceded it to him. Suppose that man had been on the Republican county committee, had been active as a Republican committeeman, but in all his relations with the Democrats of the community had always maintained their personal respect and friendship.

My colleague knows that the description I am giving would answer to a great many people in Indiana; for while we have our bitter and sharp, and nowhere else bitterer or sharper or harder, political fights, he knows right well that the lines of friendship and good-fellowship in Indiana are not party lines. He knows right well that, after all that may be said, a good, honest, open, square political fighter, who advocates the principles of his party with all the zeal and energy and force and talent he has and yet refrains his tongue from slander and vituperation, wins the respect rather than the opprobrium of his political opponents.

I am describing such a man. He would know him to be such if I should mention the name I think of; but as this is an ideal character he has no name. The Democratic Congressman I will say from that district files a charge against that man asking his removal, upon the ground that he is a blatant Republican, an offensive and blatant Republican. My colleague knows just what we mean by that—it is not a very grave charge—and the man is put out because he is a blatant Republican. Now, who is put in his stead, because this talk of offensive partisanship implies something? If you put a man out because he is of a particular class and description of partisan, it implies an obligation not to put a man in who is of the same class though of the other side in politics. If there is any honesty about it, if it is not the sheerest phariseeism, that is implied, and I know my colleague will agree to that. Now, suppose the man who is put in has been on the Democratic political committees, has been, I will say, on the executive committee, secretary or president of it. In addition to that he is the owner and editor of a Democratic paper in the town, and he has been saying just such things as my colleague knows every Democratic paper is in the habit of saying about Republicans. Oh! but it may be said he is not going to be an offensive partisan in the future. Suppose there should be found upon the records a letter like this showing the ground upon which he put his application:

It is a struggle for a Democratic paper to live in this county. * * * It is a hard row to hoe here and I think I ought to have relief. * * * It is my ambition to build up a paper of which the Democracy will feel proud and which will be second to none in the State. I will at once proceed to do this if I get the office.

[Laughter.]

If I should ask the question of my colleague what he would think of the man who would file that charge and then recommend a man who put his claims to the office upon the basis I have mentioned here, that he expected to continue to run a Democratic paper and to use the emoluments of the office to run that paper and fight the Republican party—and if I were to ask him what he thought of the sincerity, of the candor, of the manliness of the man who would make that charge and recommend that appointment, I am not in doubt as to what he would say.

I think I am safe in saying he would not wish to be the author of that piece of work, because when he asked the President to turn that man out on the ground that he was an active Republican he came under obligation not to put a man in that office who would use its emoluments and advantages in the conduct of a Democratic paper that should from week to week assail Republicans and Republican principles.

Let us uncover this, Mr. President. I would like to have the world know, I would like to have the people of Indiana know just who it is here or in the House of Representatives that would file such charges and ask removal upon such a basis, and then recommend men of the description I have named to fill the place. I know what our good people would think of it. I know they would think it was a bas eand an insincere thing whoever did it. Let us uncover this box. The President may not know this. I can not but believe, as I say, that there are secrets here hidden from him, and that he ought to know of them, that he ought to know whether he has been trusting men in their recommendations for office who are asking him to turn out men as offensive Republicans and to put in men who put their claims to the office upon the ground that they want its emoluments to run a Democratic newapaper, and on no other ground in the case I have supposed. He ought to know it. If he is sincere, as I must assume, it would shake his confidence in some of his advisers, and there may be more excuse for the President than many of us are willing to admit in the unreliable character of his advisers.

But, Mr. President, I must conclude these remarks. There was held the other day in the city of Fort Wayne, in the twelfth Congressional district of Indiana, a meeting of the Democratic Congressional committee. Let me show you who was on it.

C. A. Zollinger, of Indianapolis, the pension agent, was a chairman of the committee. William Kaough, postmaster at Fort Wayne, met with the committee as a member. Eli W. Brown, postmaster at Columbia City, met with the committee as a member; and Herman Freygang, postmaster at Angola, also met with this Democratic committee as a member.

Let us have sincere dealing about this thing. If this sort of thing, the being on committees, was ground for putting out Republicans, then if Mr. Cleveland is sincere he should put these men out.

I find in looking over the list of appointments in Indiana that sixteen Democratic newspaper proprietors and editors have been appointed to office. Now I want to ask my colleague what he thinks those papers are going to do in the next campaign? Does he think that the effect of their appointment is going to be to convert those Democratic newspapers into Mugwump organs?

Mr. VOORHEES. I hope not.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course he does not. If I could believe that in appointing these men Mr. Cleveland meant that they should pursue a perfectly inoffensive course politically, that these newspapers should not irritate the feelings of Republicans, should not publish charges against Republican candidates for office, should say nothing offensive to the Republicans—if I believed he meant by these appointments sincerely to put these sixteen Democratic newspaper editors under those bounds, I should have brighter hopes than I have now of carrying Indiana next time. But it will not be so. Here are these sixteen editors, two of the three collectors of internal revenue of the State of Indiana, and the others holding influential post-offices; and Mr. Cleveland knows and every honest Democrat knows that those sixteen newspapers will be fulminating with all the force and vigor and power and partisanship they can against the Republican party. I am not complaining of that; but if a man is to be put out, as my old soldier, Mr. Bain, of Martinsville, who marched with the regiment which I had the honor to command in the war, was put out, because he was the editor and proprietor of a Republican newspaper, and the editor of the Democratic newspaper in the same town was put in his place—if that is good reason for turning a Republican out, the same history, the same services to the Democratic party ought not to be a good reason for putting the other in.

Again, I say, let us come upon an honest basis. Let us say that to serve a man's party faithfully, honestly, zealously is not a disgrace or a disqualification for holding office. Let us have done with these charges of offensive partisanship, turning a man out for the very causes which are the recommendations of the man who is put in.

Mr. President, I have noticed another incident in connection with this reform administration. I have tried to get up a statement of the results of this administration upon the soldiers of Indiana. I have written to every county in the State and have returns from all but four of them. The returns, of course, are not absolutely accurate. They are not made up to the same time, some of them having been sent in several months before others, but the results, I think, are approximately accurate, and I find that thirty-three Presidential post-offices that were held by soldiers have been vacated either by expiration of term, resignation, or removal, and that in these offices only ten soldiers have been placed by appointment. In other words, thirty-three soldiers have gone out and ten have come in. In the whole State of Indiana I have found that three hundred and sixty-one soldiers and eleven soldiers' widows have gone out, and that ninety soldiers and one soldier's widow have come in.

Mr. President, when this administration came in the United States court-house at Indianapolis was filled from top to bottom, with a single exception, with soldiers. The United States marshal was a soldier, now he is not; the United States district attorney was a soldier, now he is not; the collector of customs was a soldier, now he is not; the collector of internal revenue was a soldier, now he is not. There was just one of the larger offices there that was filled by a civilian, and that is the post-office, and it is still filled by a civilian.

I am sorry that I have not time to go more fully into this matter. I have in my hand the report of the employment committee of the Grand Army of the Republic, for the District of Columbia, signed by Jerome B. Burke, who I understand is a Democrat. He is a Democrat, as the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] tells me, and is now the commander of the Grand Army for this department, the District of Columbia. I want to read an extract or two from that and see what these gentlemen outside of the Departments who give their time gratuitously in order to secure to worthy soldiers employment in the Departments here say about the changes under the new administration:

They say—

While the employment committee of former years were principally engaged in securing employment for applicants, and with fair success, the present committee have, we regret to report, owing to conditions that will be mentioned hereafter, received but little encouragement in proportion to the amount of labor expended in this direction. Indeed, this has been an "off year" for the class we represent. The gloomy forebodings of Commander Alexander, in his address to the last department encampment, seem to have been realized. But we have the pleasure of knowing, however, that in the few cases where employment was secured much real misery was relieved and a few homes and firesides made happier.

By far the greatest amount of our labors for the last year has been expended in seeking the reinstatement of comrades discharged from their positions in the Executive Departments, and in endeavoring to secure the retention in their places of those who had employment.

As far as we can learn there have been seventy-eight comrades of the Grand Army of the Republic discharged from Government employ during the last year, also a large number of ex-Union soldiers and sailors who are not affiliated with us, and many of the wards of the Grand Army. Of those comrades who have been discharged or who have been requested to tender their resignations, this committee has been solicited to use its influence in securing a reversal of departmental action in thirty-seven cases, in which we have been successful in ten cases, and this has been effected only by constant and repeated importunity.

* * * * * * *

Knowing that many of our comrades were anxious as to the future, and were fearful that they might lose their places, and thus bring suffering upon themselves and their families by the loss of their monthly stipends, and also knowing that there was an influential element here that was antagonistic to our organization, clamorous for places, and endeavoring to influence those in power to make wholesale discharges, caring nothing for the fact that the "boys in blue" had earned a right to hold their places under any administration, and that Congress had enacted laws in their interest, we concluded to address the President upon the subject.

Then follows a statement of the address and the response of the President.

A few weeks elapsed—

They say—

but in the mean time our comrades in the Departments were being rapidly displaced, and feeling that our appeal had not been as effectual as we had a right to expect, we again concluded to memorialize the President and request his official interposition in their behalf.

Again:

In the present instance it is known that the discharge of our comrades has not been occasioned by a reduction of the force, nor is it believed to have been caused, except in rare instances, by any supposed inefficiency or personal dereliction, for it is doubtful that those who saved a nation are skulkers, shirks, and bummers in these "piping times of peace." Nor can it be said that the civil-service act was ever intended to place an obstruction in the way of those holding office at the time of, or at any time since, its passage, provided always that the office-holder was capable, efficient, and honest.

It is said further:

It is estimated that of the total number of employés in the Departments in Washington the soldier element is about 30 per cent., and it is believed that nearly 40 per cent. of all who have been discharged come from that class—there is certainly a large percentage against us. It almost, indeed, amounts, in some places, to ostracism and a practical nullification of law.

They say further:

Nor is this the worst feature of the case, bad as it may be. Not satisfied with looking with disfavor upon the "boys in blue," it has sometimes seemed as if the "boys in gray" were to be recognized as prodigal sons returning from their wanderings for whom the fatted calf was to be especially devoted. We have seen a comrade whose army record was of the very best, and whose civil-service record was irreproachable, degraded from a high position that he won by meritorious service and his place filled by one who was in armed rebellion against the Government.

We have had an illustration of that kind even in our own State, as my colleague knows. General John Coburn, one of the best and most patriotic men who went out on the call of the governor of that State, has been replaced in his office of associate justice of Montana by Mr. C. P. Pollard, of Carroll County, Indiana, who was a confederate soldier.

So much with reference to the last resolution which the committee have submitted for our consideration. I had some other matter in this connection to which I intended to allude, but I feel that an apology is due to the Senator from Vermont who has charge of the pending resolutions for the time I have already occupied. I therefore yield the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator from Illinois yield just a moment? I will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. VOORHEES. As a matter of course I would not presume to occupy any time on this occasion; it would be unwarrantable on my part. I only rose for the purpose of saying that I will take a proper occasion to notice many of the statements made by my colleague in relation to the domestic features of politics in Indiana.

I will merely say at this time that I am not thoroughly advised on the statistics as to the soldier interests in the State, but I shall be. I have enough to warrant me in saying that in the first Congressional district, where before the present administration came into power there were but eight soldiers holding any offices, there are now twenty-four, in the post-offices and otherwise, and I am warranted in saying that in the revenue offices a better showing will be made in behalf of soldiers than under former administrations.

So far as the appointment of Judge Pollard is concerned, it is but due to him to say that his appointment is justified for reasons connected with the administration of justice by the leading Republicans of Montana.

But, as I remarked, I did not rise to discuss anything at this time, but rather to say and to save by this notice an opportunity in the future to reply to some matters which have been put forth with great ability and effect by my colleague.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me, I will say that I shall be glad when that occasion comes to meet it. I have figures, and not only figures but names, with reference to revenue offices to which my colleague alludes, and I can make good by the most specific detail what I have said as to the effect of the change of administration on the soldiers of Indiana.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me? It is late in the afternoon. Do you desire to proceed to-night? I think we had better adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no choice about it. It is late.

Mr. McMILLAN. Then, I move——

Mr. LOGAN. I would just as soon go on to-night as to speak to-morrow, for I shall occupy the Senate for only a few minutes. If the Senate wants to complete this business to-night, I am perfectly willing to go on now. If not, I think I would prefer to speak on some other occasion; but the Senator who has charge of the resolutions does not seem to indicate what he desires.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I only desire to accommodate my friend from Illinois. As we have not agreed to adjourn over to-morrow——

Mr. LOGAN. You can not accommodate me in any way whatever except to do just as you choose to do. I can go on to-night or to-morrow, just as you please.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, in view of the lateness of the hour and as we all wish to hear our friend from Illinois and we are tired, I shall propose that we meet to-morrow and finish it out then.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not know that that is exactly fair.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well; I am willing to go on to-night.

Mr. BUTLER. There has been no understanding——

Mr. LOGAN. I will go right on now.

Mr. BUTLER. I am quite willing that the Senator shall speak to-morrow as far as I am concerned, but——

Mr. LOGAN. If you will allow me I will go on now.

Mr. BUTLER. But I am not quite willing——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us stick it out.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very short time. What I shall have to say will be confined to one point. I have listened with very great pleasure to the arguments made on both sides of the questions involved. The discussion has been both able and instructive.

I must say, however, sir, without intending to criticise the honorable Senators on either side, that they have traveled over and through the domain of the Constitution, of politics, the arts and sciences, and everything known to human understanding excepting the real question presented to the Senate for its consideration by this resolution. Mr. President, I must confess that I can not understand what the question as to the power the President has under the Constitution to remove from office has to do with the question as to whether certain papers are public or private documents, and shall be furnished or not to the Senate for its inspection and use. I call the attention of my friend, one of the Senators from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who spoke yesterday (and I must say, by way of compliment to him, that he made a very able and very eloquent speech), to the fact that a great portion of his speech was devoted to a reply, as he said, to certain stump-speeches that had been made about one year and a half ago before the American people. In fact he roamed through the Territories, through railroad legislation, and through the Constitution of the United States in order to find some reason based upon something said by some stump orator as a justification for the refusal of the Attorney-General to comply with the resolution of the Senate in reference to submitting documents now on file in his office. Will any Senator tell me what the question as to how Representatives voted on chartering the Union Pacific Railroad has to do with the question as to whether the Attorney-General shall send papers to the United States Senate or not? Will the Senator from Indiana tell me what the question he discussed—as to whether rebel claims shall be paid—has to do with this question before the Senate, or whether some man has, in his extreme views, insisted that the Constitution will be so changed that after a while the slaves will be paid for? Will any one tell me what that has to do with the question before the Senate? All of these propositions he discussed on yesterday, I presume, in reply to some speech made long ago in his State in some political contest.

Mr. President, I now desire for a moment to draw the attention of the Senate to what I understand to be the issue between the Attorney-General and the Senate. It is this: The resolution passed by the Senate requesting the Attorney-General to respond thereto was in the following language:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, A. D. 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama.

This, sir, is a plain, simple direction to the Attorney-General, to do what? To send to the Senate papers and documents that have been filed in his office, in reference to what? In reference to the conduct of the office of the district attorney for the southern district of Alabama. Will any man tell me what the Pacific railroads have to do with this, or what this resolution has to do with paying rebel claims, or what it has to do with the power of the President to remove persons from office under the Constitution? It is a plain, simple proposition. Has the Senate of the United States the right to ask from the Executive Departments of the Government documents and papers filed on any subject in a Department of the Government? That is all there is of it. That is the question before the Senate.

Sir, I shall direct my remarks to this particular point. As I understand the structure of this Government, it is based upon the will of the people as the foundation and corner-stone; and the will of the people is to be ascertained on a given subject for the purpose of directing the Government in a certain line or channel. How are the people of this country to be informed on subjects connected with the Government unless they shall, through their representatives, have the opportunity of obtaining information? Information of what character? Why, sir, in reference to legislation, information in reference to appointments, information in reference to suspensions, information on any subject whatever that comes before the Congress of the United States and which the Congress of the United States may desire for the purpose of aiding or assisting them in performing the duty the people have imposed upon them. Such information they are entitled to have. That is all, sir. That is the inquiry.

Now, then, what is the response? The response of the Attorney-General, moving away from the question presented to him by the Senate, or at least partially so, is in these words:

The papers and documents—

And that is the language of the resolution—

The papers and documents which are mentioned in the said resolution, and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution.

The resolution, as I said, inquired for papers in reference to the conduct of the office. He says the papers pertain solely to the suspension of the officer, and, therefore, the request is declined because it is not compatible with public interest. The President of the United States follows this up, and he says:

I regard the papers and documents withheld, and addressed to me or intended for my use and action, purely unofficial and private, not infrequently confidential, and having reference to the performance of a duty exclusively mine.

To this statement I desire to direct the attention of Senators. The President by this declaration says that he is to be the judge of the class of papers that comes into the Departments, whether private and confidential or of a public nature; in other words, that the Senate is not permitted to be the judge as to what it may require, but that he is to judge himself as to the character of the documents it is to be permitted to examine; in other words, he will be the judge for the Senate as to what they are to do or what they are to examine as well as judge for himself.

Let us test that question for a moment and see whether he is correct. He goes on further and says that he may make such use of the papers as he sees proper; that he merely deposited them for safe-keeping in the Departments of the Government. Let us analyze this for a moment. He receives the papers, he calls them confidential, but he deposits them in one of the Departments. They go into a Department to be examined by clerks and other persons, and yet they are confidential to him. The very moment that he decides to place the papers in the Department and have them stamped as files of the Department that moment he decides the question himself and the Senate need not make the decision. The decision is made by him. The moment the papers pass out of his hands into a public depository as documents he decides that they are public papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that is the way he sends them to us here.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly; here is one of his references of these papers to the Departments:

The within communication is respectfully referred to the Attorney-General. By direction of the President.

DANIEL S. LAMONT,
Private Secretary.

Does he say that this confidential letter is handed to the Attorney-General that he may put it in some private place and keep it for him, keep it out of the pigeon-holes or away from the Department papers? No, sir; but it is referred for what purpose? For filing as a public document, and it becomes a public document the moment it passes from his hands into the hands of the Attorney-General for the files.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is purely an official act.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly, sir. It is purely an official act, and none other, done by the President, not in confidence, but by order of the President of the United States, signed by his private secretary, Mr. Lamont. Let me ask the friends on the other side of this Chamber what does the President of the United States mean when he says, "I consider them in no proper sense as upon the files of the Department;" yet they are on the files of the Department, "but deposited there for my convenience, remaining still completely under my control." Let me ask Senators on the other side how long are they to remain there as his private papers? Does he mean that he himself has control of these papers, that he can send for them to-morrow and box them up and send them to his home in New York? Is that what he means, or does he mean that he will let them remain until he retires from the Presidential chair, and then he will take them with him? Is that what he means, or does he mean that when he retires he will leave them there as his private papers under the control of the Department of the Government? Is that what he means? Can he do that, and have those papers kept by the Government for his examination at his pleasure? Is that it?

What does he propose to do with the papers? What do we propose that he shall do with them? Will you keep them there for the next ten, fifteen, or twenty years as the private papers of Grover Cleveland, that he may come and call upon the Government at any time to deliver up to him the documents because they are his private papers? Is that the proposition? If so, my judgment is that the President of the United States has in his message to Congress made a suggestion by way of a claim of a power resting in and belonging to him as President that he can not maintain either upon constitutional grounds or that of honest or fair dealing, nor upon logic or fair reasoning.

If the people through their representatives can not have access to the records of the country, on the general theory that they are the source of power, when such records or documents are requested to aid in the performance of a duty incumbent upon them in their co-ordinate capacity, where is such a theory to carry us if it is followed up? We have been told for years by our opponents that the concentration of power was one of our objects, that our theories as well as the character of our legislation proved this to be the design of our party, that this had been increasing and growing from year to year, that the power of the Government was being placed in the hands of the few, that the people were being stripped of their power day by day.

I should like for any Senator to tell me what greater concentration of power ash been shown during the existence of this Government than the attempt made by the President of the United States to take into his own hands the right to allow or not the people of this country through their representatives to examine public records, documents, and papers as he sees proper. Suppose the man guilty of fraud; suppose he has been guilty of embezzlement; suppose he is charged with any offense; will the President of the United States say, when we send for the papers to examine into the conduct of his office to see how it has been managed because he has suspended this man, the Congress of the United States shall not examine the papers? Will you say that? Suppose the Senate of the United States organizes a committee of investigation to-day and calls upon the President of the United States, the Attorney-General, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, or any other head of a Department, for papers in connection with the case either for or against the man accused, will it be said that the Senate of the United States can not have those papers? If so, why refused? Would it be on the ground that they are private documents? Is that the ground?

If this theory is to be carried out, the head of a Department might suppress papers that would convict his friends; he might suppress papers that would convict criminals; he might suppress papers that would convict himself if he be corrupt enough, and this merely upon the ground that they were private papers and could not be given out. Suppose papers charging men with violations of law, charging them with robbery, with theft, with murder, with arson, no matter what crime, came to the Secretary of the Treasury as a letter directed to him making these charges, because the letter is written to him and not officially, but is filed with the papers in the archives of the Government, when the Senate calls on him for those papers he says, "It is a private letter. I shall not give it to the Senate or the Congress of the United States," though on the files. Would not that be covering up crime under the guise of private papers on the ground that they will not deliver documents to the Congress of the United States that might involve in criminal proceedings some individual who happens to be an official of the Government and friend of the Secretary?

Without desiring to criticise the President of the United States, except in a proper manner, I would ask why this message of his was sent to the Senate of the United States? He was not asked except as he considers the Department of Justice, as of course it is, a part of the executive branch of the Government, and he wishes himself held responsible for all the papers. May we ask if he could have sent the message to Congress for the purpose of covering the acts of the heads of Departments of the Government? So the accusation must be against him, the call must be made to and through him by the Senate, so that his permission shall be given before any papers can be transmitted to either branch of Congress, that through him and him alone should papers be received or transmitted to the Senate or to the House of Representatives or to both.

Was it through him that papers which have been sent here and read in debate were transmitted? I will not so charge, as it could not be that the President would consent to such a practice as we have seen indulged in on this floor, of taking papers from the files of Departments to be read here by Senators, when refused to the Senate as a body.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the point which is covered by that. It is this: That an order which the President might give to the heads of Departments must be obeyed the same as a military order, so that a call made upon the head of a Department for any paper should be submitted to him before the paper shall be transmitted to Congress; that he alone, as President of the United States, shall judge of every paper that might be transmitted to Congress as to whether it is a document proper to be transmitted or not; that he should be the sole judge to determine that question, taking it out of the hands of the heads of Departments, and depriving the Congress of the United States of the right to judge as to whether a paper is a document of such character as to make it of importance in aiding the Senate to form a proper conclusion as to its duty or not?

As I have said, I do not wish to discuss other than this one point. It is too late in the day if I desired, and I have no desire, to do so. I wish, however, to refer briefly to one suspension of an officer, one case in my State, that of a man suspended from office who was in Andersonville prison for over one year. He has written many letters to me asking that his case might be investigated to see why he was suspended. He believed that he had been accused of some offense. On general principles I wrote to him that he was entitled to know what charges were made against him.

I have since found that there were no charges made against him, although he was suspended for "cause." Yet no cause exists. Pretense, of course, for suspension of officers where none exists of a political character is a hypocrisy that ought not to be practiced upon the American people. It is not an honest statement, it is not just, and is merely dodging the question.

If I have the power to suspend a man from office where he has performed no act that is in violation of law, but has performed the duties of the office properly; if I suspend him under these circumstances and state that I do it for "cause," I do that man an injury, an injustice. I do it improperly. Why? As we understand the law, or at least as I do, "cause" is some act that the man does which renders him either disqualified in some sense, either by a wrong act in office or some failure to perform his duty, or some improper conduct in office. That is "cause" for it. It is not that a man entertains one class of political sentiments or another. That is not understanding of the law in the use of the term "cause." The law never contemplated that if a man was a Democrat or a Republican that this was to be understood as "cause" in law for his suspension from office, but that the "cause" should grow out of his official acts in office; in other words, the manner in which he performed the duties thereof. So when the President sends a message to the Senate stating that a person is suspended for cause it means that the person has performed some act or failed to perform some act in office which renders him an unfit and improper man to hold the office.

So that when the President makes the statement against a person charging his suspension for "cause" before the Senate, which means wrongdoing, the person is entitled to a hearing. In other words, he is entitled to have his answer made to the charge that his reputation may not be made to suffer wrongfully. If, as has been said, he was suspended because of his party fealty, that is one thing. If the President wants to suspend for that reason he can certainly do it, and if he sends the name of parties here in place of others suspended for that reason or for no reason, I, for one, shall not take exception, if the man nominated is qualified, and is an honest and proper man.

In speaking of the hypocrisy of this thing, I desire to call attention to but one letter from the Postmaster-General. I have many. One, however, will answer my purpose. I refer to a letter written to the President of the United States and answered by his Postmaster-General. I will read it:

MARTINSBURG, W. VA., June 17, 1885.

The President:

I am informed that charges have been, or are to be, preferred against me as postmaster at this place. While I hold a commission which will not expire until February, 1888, and am willing to devote my service to the best interest of the office, yet if it is your desire to appoint another to my place I shall cheerfully tender my resignation at any time that you may indicate.

I was appointed to office under a Republican administration, and have given that party my earnest support, notwithstanding I have always accorded to others the same right to their political opinions that I demand for myself. I ask that you will accord me the opportunity to answer any charges that shall be made against my character. I am willing to resign my office if it is your pleasure, but I am not willing to have charges made against my good name without an opportunity to repel them.

Very respectfully,

GEORGE F. EVANS,
Postmaster, Martinsburg, Berkeley County, West Virginia.

Hon. GROVER CLEVELAND,
Washington, D. C.

The President, through his Secretary, writes the following letter:

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, June 20, 1885.

DEAR SIR: The President directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 17th instant, and to inform you that it has been referred for the information of the Postmaster-General.

Very respectfully,

DANIEL S. LAMONT,
Private Secretary.

GEORGE F. EVANS, Esq.,
Martinsburg, W. Va.

That letter was written to the President by the postmaster at Martinsburg saying that he would tender his resignation if the President desired him to do so. It was "referred" to the Postmaster-General. For what? For the purpose of the Postmaster-General taking such action as he should deem proper, or no action at all if he saw proper. Will any one say that that is a private letter which the President could not send to the Senate on account of its being of a confidential nature? Suppose he did not accept his resignation? Suppose he had said, "He is a good man, I shall retain him in office;" it was a private letter to the President just as much as any letter that is written to him on the subject of an office. Yet it is referred, and referred for what purpose? We will see in a moment. The Postmaster-General takes the letter and examines it. What does he do? He writes as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., November 10, 1885.

SIR: Having under consideration the propriety of a change of postmaster at Martinsburg, your letter of the 17th of June last, to the President, came to my attention, in which you say: "If it is your desire to appoint another to my place I shall cheerfully tender my resignation at any time that you may indicate."

The President indicates nothing; he merely refers the letter to the Postmaster-General. The Postmaster-General says further:

Observing this letter and because of the manliness of tone and sentiment exhibited by it, not altogether common in communications from persons so situated, I desire to say to you that no charges are made against your personal character or official conduct, but only such as relate to your political activity as a supporter of the Republican party, and I very cheerfully comply with your request and tender you, with an intimation that an early reply will be expected, the opportunity to lay down your public office by resignation.

Yours, truly,

WM. F. VILAS, Postmaster-General.

GEORGE F. EVANS,
Postmaster, Martinsburg, W. Va.

I ask any Senator here why should a letter of that character be kept from the Senate? There was a man who resigned, but suppose he had not resigned he would have been suspended for cause; and yet the Postmaster-General says there are no charges against him so far as his personal or official character is concerned, but he was a Republican; therefore he will accept his resignation. The President under his statement would refuse to send a letter like this to the Senate; he would say that it was a personal or private letter. Suppose this man had written merely to learn if charges were preferred against him and had not tendered his resignation, would that have changed its character when referred to the Postmaster-General by the President? Would it not have become a part of the files of the Department?

Surely, Mr. President, this would be so.

I wish to call attention to an appointment, or I should say a nomination, in my State. I mention the fact for the reason that this country has been flooded with letters and proclamations and messages on the subject of reform in the civil service, also as to the character of the men who should hold office. I present this merely as a companion-piece to the one mentioned by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON].

This man is in a post-office under this administration in one of the larger cities in the State of Illinois. He was dismissed from the service of the United States as a colonel because of making false musters in his regiment. He came home and entered into business with a partner, committed frauds upon the Government, was indicted in the United States court for so doing, and was acquitted by interposing the plea of the statute of limitations. I went to the President and made this statement to him, yet he was commissioned and his name sent to the Senate after my statement. How it came about I do not know, but such is the fact.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And you assured him that you had proof of record, too.

Mr. LOGAN. I told him that I had the record; I have it here, certified by the clerk of the circuit court of the United States. I have no comment to make. His name ought not to have been sent to the Senate. I stated this to the President so that he might not be commissioned, and that his name should not be sent to the Senate. It was done, however.

Mr. FRYE. Has he been confirmed?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir, he has not been confirmed, and will not be if I can prevent it.

Mr. President, a word more. I believe in the doctrine that this Government is a government of the people, by and for them; that the representatives of the American people are entitled to have information that will guide them in the performance of their duty, and the man, the party, or the set of men who shall undertake to keep from the people, or deny them that knowledge in reference to the manner in which their servants are performing their duty, will have a short political life. I believe not only that the people are entitled to know, but if they desire they ought to have the right to examine any record or public document in the Departments of the Government, by and through their representatives in Congress, when called for in a proper way.

It is on that theory and on that principle that I have been in favor, and am yet, of the doors of the Senate being open when matters of nominations are to be acted upon, so that the country may know what character of men are to be appointed to office; and if for nothing more than for the purpose that the people of this country should have an eye upon everything that their public servants do, unworthy men would not ask to have their characters examined in public. Men only whose characters could stand in the sunlight and bear inspection by the people would dare to have their names brought before the Senate for its consent to their appointment.

I am for the people of this country having an opportunity to assist their public servants in the performance of their duties by a knowledge of that which their representatives may do.

So, too, in reference to the course of the President, in any of the Departments, in the performance of this duty, or in connection with anything pertaining to their offices which might aid in bringing about intelligent legislation, or in connection with the character of any official or any one who is to become an official, whenever they close the box on documents or papers of a public or official character they are denying to the people of this country from whom power comes, and claiming it in themselves, to be dealt out to the people as they shall deem right, they being the judges.

Sir, this Government is not a government where power descends from the throne to the people as the throne may be disposed to parcel it out; but it is a government where the power comes up from the people to their representatives, to their Cabinet ministers, and to their President. Only in that way do they obtain power, and only through that will should it be exercised; whenever any one in this country arrogates to himself the power exercised by a Czar in withholding from the people or their representatives any right or privilege the theory and principles of our Government are violated and our people impeded in moving forward in our growing character as a free people.

So, sir, in regard to the President, for whom I have great respect. He has mistaken his power. He is mistaken in the idea that as President he is more than an American citizen who has been placed there to do the will of the American people. He is merely the head to perform certain functions conferred upon him by the Constitution and the laws of the country, and those are to be performed in accordance with the will of the people whom he represents. When he fails to do that he fails as their Chief Magistrate.

I do not know what is to be the final result of this question. "You may pass these resolutions," said a Senator yesterday, "but when you do that what have you accomplished? You can not force the President to send these papers." Well, sir, that is true; with a House of Representatives against the theory that we act upon, there is no remedy for the present; but we can do this, and we will do it: we will bring the fact to the minds of the American people that no man can be a Cæsar in this country; that this is a Government where the people can and will be heard. It may be deferred for a short time, but only for a short time. When the people are or ever have been heard in reference to questions where unwarranted power has been attempted by any one in this Government, the people have always repudiated the exercise of that unwarranted power, and I believe they ever will.

If the resolutions are passed and we do not get the papers, what then? We will at least have said to the people in the most emphatic manner that the refusal to comply with the request of the Senate of the United States was such a flagrant violation of the rights of the people, and, in our judgment, so flagrant and unwarranted, that we condemn the act and go before the people and let them decide whether they propose to give up any of their rights as asserted by their representatives. Sir, they have never decided in favor of the exercise of arbitrary power in any case when the question has been made fairly before them.

Mr. President, I have said in this short time all that I desired to say on this one point, and being very anxious to hear the Senator from Vermont, who is certainly more competent to discuss this question than myself, the hour being late, I can not feel satisfied in longer holding the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the general aspects of this discussion have been so completely exhausted by the observations of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr.

HARRISON] and the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], that my duty in concluding this debate is comparatively an easy and a narrow one.

The circumstance that this denial of papers has for its motive and its purpose the concealment from the Senate of the United States (and in a similar case from the House of Representatives, which might, I think, rightly ask for everything that exists in the Departments), so clear a case of endeavoring to cover up what the great majority of the Democratic party consider to be a false position of the President of the United States, that it is not necessary in my judgment to make any special remark thereon.

The trouble with this administration has been that when it was about to be elected, or wished to be elected, it thought it had a virtue that a good many people in the United States who had a right to their opinions by whatever name you call them believed in, and that it would be a good thing for their success to have that virtue, or to affect it if they had it not; and they came in on professions that the Senator from Kansas has read to-day, iterated and reiterated in respect of what should become of public offices for the public purposes and for the public uses; and it was not easy for the President of the United States to get out of that dilemma. Well, he came in, and he came in as everybody knows that he could not otherwise have come in, be it good or bad, right or wrong, on the profession that the great mass of the mere administrative functions of the Government should no longer be the stakes that political gamblers played for or the spoils that political warriors fought for. I am not now saying, and I am not going to say, because it has nothing to do with this question, whether that was a good thing or a bad thing, but that was the platform on which the President of the United States came to his position, and I suppose that nobody who hears me, below the galleries, will deny that proposition.

Very well. Having got in, the question was then what was to be done? Was the President to follow what he had said, no matter how many of his political friends it irritated, no matter how many of the great Sanhedrim of his political Senatorial friends might differ from him, whom he says in his message he has consulted, and I suppose that means you all—pretty nearly all. The question was whether he was going to stick to his professions or whether he could not.

Anybody who has had as long experience in this world of American affairs as you, Mr. President, can readily see that what the administration was to do as a fact must depend in a country of sixty million people and of thousands and tens of thousands of offices, upon those whom the President called around him as his heads of Departments. If you and I, and my friends from South Carolina and West Virginia, and so on, had made up his Cabinet and we had thought as he professed to think that he did, and did think, I dare say, that this change of mere President of the United States whose only mission was to execute law, was not going to disturb the autonomy of the mere work of the Government on the sole ground of political opinion, and we had all thought so and acted so, then you and I and all the others making up that body, when applications were made to us for changes would have said, "No, we can not do it."

Nine-tenths of all these offices (leaving out those that Mr. Vilas has taken into his special charge by inviting slanders, &c., the fourth-class postmasters), are offices that have terms of four years and no more; and in the first year of an administration that was to practice what it professed, much more than one-fourth of the offices would fall vacant, because by the mere course of time one-quarter would have done it. Resignations, removals for cause, death, accident, and all that, would have made up a larger number than a quarter in the first year.

When you had got to the second year you would have found that instead of two-fourths you had nearly three-fourths of the offices falling vacant, and into them you could have put Democrats, with the unanimous consent of this Republican Senate, given that the men named were honest and honorable and true as men, not the persons whom the Democratic party has decorated with its favors and admirations, as the Senator from Indiana showed us, because they had been in the penitentiary or whatever, but that other and smaller proportion of the Democratic party that contained and comprised and was embodied in honest men. You would have got into the offices of this Government before half your administration was out, at least three-fifths of all the executive functions of the Government, and before the term of this present President would have been out by almost a year there would have been nine-tenths of the offices in the hands of his political adherents. I should not say "adherents," but in the hands of men whose political opinions were like his—that is to say, they would have been in favor of suspending silver coinage no more; they would have been in favor of encouraging the pauper labor of Great Britain, Germany, and France, &c., at the expense of the honest labor of American citizens. That is what I understand by a Democrat, you know.

So it was quite unnecessary, in order that the equilibrium of nonpartisanship in offices should be observed and maintained, that the Postmaster-General, after consulting the President, as he says he does in his letter signed by himself officially as Postmaster-General and therefore not a private and confidential paper, should have invited persons to make charges against officials that are never to be heard or examined by anybody but the official to whom they are proposed, in order that an excuse and pretense may be made, consistently with the professions of the President before and after his election, for making changes.

Now, I want to ask my good friends on the other side—for I am not talking for politics, I am talking for our country and our great institutions—if they think that is a square and honest way. I should like to wait a little while to see if anybody will stand up and say that he does. When in some of the churches the pastor stands up and calls for contributions he mentions gentlemen by name and says: Now Mr. So-and-so—but as I am not a pastor I will not ask my friend, the Senator from South Carolina, the Senator from Mississippi, or the Senator from Georgia, or from wherever, to stand up and answer to that proposition.

Mr. BUTLER. If it were not so near dinner-time, I can tell the Senator I should have something to say.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it near dinner-time? We shall wait dinner for a better feast—what the Senator from South Carolina has to say.

Mr. BUTLER. Then I move that the Senate adjourn. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President, that is not exactly the thing [laughter], although I am bound to confess that it is the best possible answer the Senator from South Carolina can make. He is quite right about that.

So we stand in this position when we merely look at what is the pretension of this administration and at what is its performance. I am bound to say for the President of the United States—not for him, because I am not admitted to his councils, and I do not wish to be unless he gets better councils than he has had before [laughter]—that I think it is perfectly impossible, in a Government that is so great and extensive as this is in respect of its administrative functions, for any President of the United States to deal with the personal details about selections for office. He can not do it; if there were a hundred hours in the day instead of twenty-four he could not do it. He must, therefore, depend upon his heads of Departments in respect of the various questions that arise in regard to offices in those various Departments.

Now if the President of the United States, filled with this enthusiasm of reform as he was, had selected some one out of the seven, some two or three, or, better, the whole seven, who believed in any such thing and who thought as he did, we should not have had any difficulty at all; but the unhappy circumstance is, going upon his theories, and they are mine, that, so far as I know with one exception—I do not profess to speak by the book, you understand—in the whole seven of those highly respectable gentlemen there is only one who does not believe that the mission of the Democratic party is to get every office at its success in an election, and that that is precisely what the election is for.

It has not got any other principle; it has not had any other measure in twenty years. There is no measure for the welfare and improvement and progress of this country that has been proposed by the Democratic party in the twenty-five years that it has been out of office and in office in the House of Representatives and here, for during that period it has had even in the time of war once, you know, the practical control of this Government. There is no one measure that looks to the welfare of this country affirmatively that it can agree upon and agree to.

Its mission has been repressive and reactionary from beginning to end; and so we can readily understand and imagine that when its mission was accomplished by the election of the present President of the United States, in spite of his professions, honest and earnest and sincere as I will assume them to have been, if there came into his councils as the persons in charge of all this question of offices men who did not believe at all as he did, he would be day in and day out imposed upon—and by that I do not mean any personal reflection upon the gentlemen of the Cabinet—but deluded (that is a better word) into agreeing that one man should be nominated for an office and another man suspended, not upon the grounds that the President of the United States had stated to the public and on which he got the votes of the public, but upon the ground that the person proposed had been eager in season and out of season in promoting the success of his election, whether by—and there I do not mean to say that he should know it or that the heads of Departments should know it—whether by violence or by stuffing ballot-boxes or by fraud in the count. The Senator from Indiana has shown us that many an appointee has been doing in his way and generation the best service that could be done for the Democratic party; and that was that he would justify any means that would bring that party in, and, being in, the only mission it had was to put its fellows in office under one pretext or another.

That is the situation in its general aspects. I will speak of it a little later, because I only intend to occupy a few minutes, and I shall leave that aspect of it now and come to some of the things that my distinguished friends on the other side have said about the precise question which is before the Senate, and so leaving the Democratic party for the time being we will come back to Duskin.

Honorable gentlemen on the other side have said that the resolution of the Senate calling for papers and information was entirely inconspicuous and inefficacious and ought to be refused because Duskin's term had expired pending these considerations. How do we know that? The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] has told us—I believe he is the only one, but that is enough; his word is good—that by the Blue Book it appears that Duskin's term expired at a certain day pending this session, and before, I will assume, this resolution of the Senate was passed. Suppose it did. What will the Journal of the Senate show? That the President of the United States has invited the Senate to agree to remove Mr. Duskin, suspended, and to appoint Burnett in his place. Now, supposing this term has expired, and we are to vote "yes," for all time to come the Journal of the Senate will show that the Senate of the United States has agreed to remove Duskin and appoint Burnett, the professions of the Presiden tof the United States to the whole body of his countrymen having been that Duskin ought not to be removed or Burnett appointed unless Duskin had been guilty of misconduct in his office, or unless, in the language of the Postmaster-General, who says he speaks for the President, Duskin has been "an offensive partisan," whatever that may mean. That will be the record; that will be the vote that your name and mine, Mr. President, in the Journal of the Senate on the yeas and nays would stand for.

Now, if in this time the period of Duskin's official existence has terminated, why does not the President of the United States tell us that the lapse of time has changed the situation and that we have no longer to consider what he has asked us to consider—the removal of Duskin; but we have only to consider the filling of a vacancy? Why does he not do it? I have a right to say, I think—at any rate whether I have a right or not, and I am sure I have the right to say—that in this instance and in others of the same character, which are numerous, as they naturally would be, after what I have said about the termination of offices, so that the administration would have them all in less than three years by lapse of term, the attention of the head of the Department of Justice has been called to the fact that, no matter whether for good grounds or bad grounds, some officer had been put under arrest and another person designated in his place; and if his term had expired, if the President of the United States did not desire to force the Senate into approval of what he had done before, he could easily rectify the situation by telling the simple truth to us now that the situation had changed and that he proposed to fill the vacancy. He has not done it. Weeks and weeks have gone by since the attention of one department of this Government has been called to a large class of these cases and the suggestion made, which is perfectly simple and which everybody understands, if now this term having expired you wish to put it so as not to force us to a false position on the records and Journal of the Senate, if you wish to put us in the attitude of filling a vacancy, we will consider that, and they say, "We will not do it." There is where they stand. The Senate of the United States, therefore, is compelled to act upon the situation as the President himself presents it and refuses to present it in any other way.

So I think I am not out of place in saying that so far as the circumstance that Mr. Duskin is now said to be out of office by expiration of term, as appears from the Blue Book, is concerned, the President of the United States and his Attorney-General, who, according to his letter, considers himself to be merely the obsequious servant of the President and not of the law, say, "We insist upon your deciding upon the question of removing Duskin; we are unwilling to change the situation as history has changed it by the vacation of this office by expiration of term and ask you to consider whether Burnett is a suitable person to put in, but you must pass, and we insist upon it, upon precisely the question that the President has submitted to you before he was out of office, and we will not submit any new question." Is there any honest Democratic Senator who believes in fair play who would not say, "If you compel us to consider that question we must consider it just as if this term had not expired?" There is where you stand.

But go a little further, Mr. President. Let us suppose now for the sake of the discussion that the Constitution of the United States had said in explicit terms that the President of the United States should have complete power to remove every officer under the Government, so that it is not a matter of difference and dispute as it always has been, although lately in respect of all offices not named in the Constitution the Supreme Court of the United States would appear to have settled the Constitution that Congress may by law fix and regulate the term of every officer. Suppose the President of the United States had by express expression in the Constitution that power. Now he tells us he has removed a man, as he had a perfect right to do, and he has proposed another man as his successor. Then the Senate of the United States asks the head of a Department that by law exists and not by the Constitution, and that by law is put under no direction and control of the President at all, as the War and the Navy and the State Departments are in a certain sense, to tell us what has been the conduct and management of that office for six month, for twelve months, for eighteen months, for twenty-four or any other number of months before and after.

What then? Wherefore should we not have that information? Granted that the President of the United States has the right to remove, and he has removed the man, when he asks us to advise and consent to the appointment of a man who for six months when this resolution was passed had been doing the duties of that office, and we ask the head of that Department to tell us how that office had been conducted before he came in, and how it had been conducted after he came in, where does the head of that Department or the President of the United States, or any other power get the authority to say that information shall be denied to the Senate and by similar reasoning denied to the House of Representatives? What the Senate has asked for is not reasons; it is not motives; it is official facts concerning the state and condition of the public service, and nothing else. And when the Attorney-General responds to this direction of the Senate, historic, consecutive, continuous for infinite years, he does not put himself upon the ground that Senators on the other side of this Chamber have put him. They have put him into a position that he did not choose for himself. He does not say or intimate that we have called for private or confidential papers or confidential official papers; he only says that these public papers that we have called for—public in the sense that they are official and belong to the administration of the Department—have been considered by the President of the United States in making a suspension that the law authorized him to make, and having been considered by the President of the United States in doing what the law authorizes him to do, it is not within the competence of the Senate to know the contents of these public and official papers. That is it. It is not, he says, for the Senate to consider them, as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] suggests, in what the law authorizes and requires us to do.

Then the pretension and position of the Attorney-General is unconstitutional, for the law has created the Attorney-General and has not imputed to the President of the United States any control over him at all except the power to remove by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or without it, whichever way you please. The Attorney-General tells us that these official papers, in respect to which there is no hint or suggestion in his letter that they are other, having fallen under the eye of the President in respect of doing a duty that the law imputed to him, they can fall under the eye of no other branch of this Government that has a duty in respect to the same subject. That is the proposition; and how on anything except the stress of party, and, as a Democratic Senator is said to have stated, the stress of a party that depends upon something to be got from the patronage of the President of the United States, can it be defended or excused?

And that, sir, illustrates a thing in respect to which I should not quite agree with my friend from Kansas—the value to the infinite public interests, as this country grows more and more in population and expansion and development, of getting out from being what constitutes the object of political parties, the mere question of holding office. I think I am safe in saying—a good many better people than I have said it before, Democrats, Republicans, Whigs, everybody—that if you took out of this very presence at this moment the influence of executive patronage to be given to Senators and their friends, there would not be five votes in this Chamber against any one or all of the resolutions proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary. There is the crib, and the ox, I believe the Scripture says, knows his master's stall; and anybody who has a henchman or a friend who has not been in office, or who is liable to be turned out, as they all are on this theory, who stands up in the face of the power of executive patronage and votes with or against his party to say that there shall be revealed those things that the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Illinois have only in a faint and feeble way comparatively stated, for they are everywhere, as we all know, would find that the lines of political preferment would fall in other places, and that your people out of the penitentiary or in, as the case might be, if the administration were left to pursue its own loves among the bowers and leave ours to us, as the case might be, would come in.

There is the trouble, sir; and there is the trouble with this administration; and it is still further illustrated by the fact, as you know, as we all know—it is not private and confidential; the newspapers all know it, and they indeed know a good deal that is private and confidential and a good deal that they think is and is not—that down to a certain day in this present session of the Senate, following the experience of a hundred years, various of these Departments—not all but various of them—following the experience and the practice of a hundred years under all administrations and of all politics, had sent to the committees of this body the papers that touched the subjects we were asking for. It was only when at last it came to be seen that in nine cases in ten of complaints and charges for removals for cause, they were lies and slanders and frivolous, as the President in his message tells us himself, that the thing suddenly stopped.

There have been certain people in the newspapers and so on who have said that the thing was running down to a point where a good many people in this body would have, considering these to be private papers, to take out their private papers from the public files, lest they might be confronted by an indignant citizen in their own State and be put in rather a troublesome condition. But of course that must be a scandal, because it is impossible to conceive that a Senator or a member of the House of Representatives could have filed or sent to the President of the United States or to a head of Department any statement about his fellow-citizen in his own State or elsewhere that he would not be willing that that fellow-citizen should know, because that would be a baseness so infinite that we can not think that any administration, even a Democratic one, could tolerate a thing of that kind. So I assume that these stories, which are flying about in the air like so many other improper ones, that the tracks of papers, as the President described them, capable of being withdrawn or burned up, &c., marked the trail like the worm after a storm, coming up toward the Senate Chamber, must be a mistake. It can not have been that reason, therefore, that led the administration to stop the business of the free and frank communication of everything, as all its predecessors had done. I must assume that.

Where are we then, Mr. President? We are just simply here: The Committee on the Judiciary since the passage of the tenure-of-office law, as I showed to you before and as I will show to you a little further now, and I suppose most if not all the other committees had been in the regular and steady practice—not sporadic, not personal, but public, administrative, systematic, for the good order and due administration of public affairs—of sending to the heads of Departments requests, not authorized by the Senate, and that illustrates what I was to say to my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] about the third resolution—not authorized by the Senate, but as a simple and convenient practice that did not require any coercive order of the Senate, but as of course to every one of these Departments for every information that bore upon every topic that was presented to them; and they got it. That was practiced before in fact. Well, the Committee on the Judiciary did that thing. It had done it. It did it in this instance just as in all others, not selected, not special, but simply co-ordinated with every act of the committee in the due discharge of its duty, not out of its order, not otherwise for this information. It had done in that what its Democratic and its Republican predecessors had always done before.

My friend from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] undertook to explain the letter of the chairman of the Democratic Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate in 1879, by the circumstance that the man suspended in that instance was a Territorial judge, and that the power of removal of a judge if it existed at all must exist under the Constitution. Suppose that to be so—I do not agree with it—but suppose that to be so, where are we then? Then we find the Democratic committee of the Senate in 1879 invading on your theory, the function of the President under the Constitution of undertaking to remove Shaffer, a judge in a Territory, entirely apart from the tenure-of-office law, and your Democratic chairman of a committee of this body, with the unanimous approval of all his colleagues, Republican and Democratic, and according to the standing order and custom of that committee, not for party but for truth and fair play, called on the Attorney-General to communicate what there was about that removal. Take it that way, does that help it? I do not think it does help the argument of my honorable and distinguished friend from Alabama a bit. But suppose you could imagine that he could have deluded himself in that way, as he did undoubtedly, for he is an upright and fair-minded man; when you go on a few days more you find that we have got a case of a man who was not a Territorial judge. You have got the case of a district attorney and then Judge Thurman, the chairman of the committee, in 1879 and 1880 writes to the Attorney-General under the direction of the committee, with all his Democratic colleagues assenting in this way.

JANUARY 28, 1880.

SIR: I am instructed by the committee to ask that you will furnish it with any papers on file in your Department relative to the subject of any imputed misconduct on the part of the present attorney of the United States for the Territory of Wyoming, Mr. C. H. Laymon, or any information bearing on the causes for his removal. This committee is in receipt of the papers recommending the appointment of Melville A. Brown, but have no information touching the cause for the removal of the present incumbent.

Very respectfully,

A. G. THURMAN, Chairman.

Hon. CHARLES DEVENS,
Attorney-General.

There is an answer to that which I will not take your time to read—it is at the service of any Senator—an answer not like that of the present Attorney-General of the United States when the Senate calls upon him, but the officer answered to the committee, knowing that the committees had no legal power to compel him to answer, as we all understand, but knowing that it was a course of practice that was convenient and that if he refused the Senate on a proper statement would make the order, and he gives the reasons why this person had been held up and was proposed to be removed, full, frank, fair, and candid, so that this coordinate branch of this political department of the Government was possessed of the information as to the conduct of that office and the administration of the office that would and should enable it to advise the President under the oaths of its members honestly and fairly as to what he ought to do.

If that was right, as it was, for a Democratic Senate in 1879 and 1880, is it not right for a Republican Senate in 1885 and 1886? Will somebody tell me what is the distinction? Do you imagine, Mr. President, that great man, the chairman of that committee, and his great colleagues, having the strongest possible motives for resistance to everything that the then administration wished to do, should have taken upon themselves to demand of the head of a Department information about the causes and reasons why a Territorial district attorney or a State district attorney, whatever he was, should be turned out of office, except that they felt that the duty of the Senate which it is bound to do, great or small, under the Constitution was a duty that required information to enable them to judge rightly? Will anybody tell me no? Of course he will not.

Our friends on the other side have said, and with considerable fire and vigor, that the Republican majority in this Senate is undertaking to make a raid on this administration, to embarrass it, and to obstruct it. Where is your proof of it? What have we done? We have done simpliciter in mode and form what our Democratic predecessors have done to a Republican administration, not against the opposition of their Republican colleagues in the minority here then, but with their support and favor, as necessary to the due and true administration of a government that belongs to the people of the United States and that is to be administered upon the principles of honor and fair play. That is all.

Wherefore then do you tell us that we have taken a new departure? I remember now that some Senator, perhaps the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. KENNA], perhaps the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], perhaps the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], though I should hardly suspect him of that, has said that we did not deal with the case of Arthur and Cornell in the way that we have dealt with this, and that we showed a tenderness (as if that had anything to do with our rights and duties!) toward the then President of the United States in that instance that we do not show in this. That is not true. When a committee of the Senate having no authority, as none of its committees has without the affirmative vote of the Senate, as we all know, to call for information, called on the Secretary of the Treasury in a somewhat effusive and exuberant way for all sorts of things, the then Secretary of the Treasury made a reply which has been read. Within a week afterward a Senator offered a resolution, a Republican Senator and supporter of that Republican administration, directing the Secretary of the Treasury—and I am authorized to say it because it comes under the provision we have ordered that calls for papers and so forth are open and I shall not violate the rules——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was made public by order of the Senate at the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Of course I am giving it historically. A Republican Senator, a friend of that Republican administration, wishing with all his heart to help it in every way he could, this letter of the Secretary to the committee being known, offered a resolution which I have here directing that Secretary to communicate to the Senate, not reasons, not motives—we do not care for those or for our own reasons and our own motives; what we want is facts; what we want is the truth—directing the Secretary of the Treasury to send us everything there was on file in that Department concerning this topic. Very well; that was the last week of a called session. Somebody of course objected to it, as we all know that somebody sometimes objects to a good many things; and so there came the regular session within a week afterwards. The resolution was not acted upon at the special session. Then the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury knowing full well what were the rights and responsibilities of the two departments of the Government in regard to public affairs, and with a due and a true sense of their duty to the Senate of the United States, did not wait to have that resolution adopted, but the President sent a message with a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury covering the whole subject, sending every paper and every document; and that was followed as I believe by the personal attendance of the Secretary of the Treasury in the room of the Committee on Finance in order that every fact, every circumstance, every accusation, every doubt might be fairly and truly laid before the body that was to pass upon that question. And yet you gentlemen tell us that we are adopting a new contrivance to embarrass this somewhat embarrassed President of yours—embarrassed not by us but embarrassed by what I believe is his sincere desire to diminish the loot that comes from political success on one side or the other, and which he has not been able to diminish from circumstances that it would not be altogether polite and respectful for me to mention.

Now I ought in respect to my distinguished friend from West Virginia to refer to one or two things that he said in his observations with regard to the inaccuracies, to state it mildly, that I was supposed to have committed in the observations that I made in the opening of this discussion; and the first and most important one was, as he stated it, and he stated it truly, that I had said in my remarks that when General Washington declined to send papers to the House of Representatives containing the instructions that had been given to the American representatives in England on the subject of the Jay treaty, it was still pending in the Senate, when, as he showed truly and from the Journals, two or three or four or five or six days before (no matter what time) the treaty had been ratified.

If I had been the wise and prudent man that so many of my fellows are and had revised my remarks and seen them before they went into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I assume that I should have known enough to see that in the current of unprepared and unnoted speechmaking I had used a phrase that was inaccurate in literal fact.

Mr. KENNA. The Senator will allow me to say he would also have to make a similar revision in his report to the Senate in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will pardon me while I go on a minute, I will come to that. I say I might have revised that remark and instead of saying that the treaty was pending before the Senate, said that the subject was still undisposed of. Now the Senator refers to the report. The report does not say that any treaty was pending.

The report says as a hypothetical instance, on a request to the President, as distinguished from a command to a Department which the law has created, that if the treaty or whatever was pending before the Senate there might be a good excuse for the President (a man whom we can not put in jail for a contempt of our authority and we should never think of it, as we could a Secretary, because he being in durance there is an end of your Government for the time being); but the committee said as a hypothesis that it could conceive of an instance where a treaty or subject was before the Senate where it would not be competent or proper for the papers to be called for.

Now I come back. I did make the immeasurable, the dreadful mistake of saying, not having revised my observations, that that treaty was pending, in reciting it. The treaty had been ratified four days before. The next day after there came nominations for people to carry out the provisions of that treaty; and there was then pending a negotiation and which culminated a few weeks afterward—three, four, or eight weeks, no matter which, call it two months or three months; to be sure that I shall not be taken up again for an error, call it six months if you like—in an additional article explanatory of that very treaty.

So then the thing that I ought to have said—and if I had pursued the course which perhaps every Senator ought to pursue to study over what he is to say beforehand and put it into shape, I should not have fallen into that stupendous error—was that the attitude of General George Washington was according to the facts as they then existed, that here were still in fieri questions of the utmost delicacy and consequence and importance between ourselves and Great Britain; and he told the House of Representatives that under those circumstances he could not give them the papers, that the Senate were the people who were entitled to the papers, if anybody, and to the Senate he had given all the papers. Now I do not mean to say by any means that I acquiesce in the opinion of General George Washington, as presumptuous as it may be in me to say it, for I believe in a government of the people, from whom and to whom all desires are known, and from whom no secrets shall be hid. But then if my honorable and distinguished friend from West Virginia had looked a little further, as perhaps he did, he would have seen that the House of Representatives, after that rebuff which, as the committee say in their report, only illustrates and enforces the universal rule of the right of the two Houses to know all that exists in relation to public affairs, that same House of Representatives, with the utmost gentleness and deference to George Washington, proceeded nevertheless to declare in clear and pronounced terms, first, that when they were considering any subject which was within their jurisdiction they had a right to all the knowledge that would bear upon it; and, secondly, which is more to this point, that it was no part of the mission of the President of the United States to undertake to decide whether the information that they called for on such topics would be useful to them or not. Mr. James Madison and a great number of others, nearly two to one or three to five, or whatever it may have been, voted for that proposition on the yeas and nays, and there it stands.

Now I will come down to the other instance—because I must hurry on—that was the most impressive to my mind, and I presume to the public, that my friend from West Virginia stated; and that was the Tyler business of 1844. Uncle Billy Allen of Ohio offered a resolution about the Oregon papers, for that really, aside from the instance of Jackson about removals that I referred to before, is the only case that really would seem by the utmost stretch of imagination to make a break, as the committee have stated in their report and as I stated in my observations, for almost half a century. What was it? If my friend from West Virginia will look at the legislative Journal of the Senate of the day before the 9th of January or whatever the day was when this thing was offered in executive session, he will see that Uncle Billy Allen of Ohio—I believe the uncle of ex-Senator Thurman and a good and true Democrat, perhaps as good as there are now, nobody can tell—offered a resolution calling for this very same information, and the Senate on the yeas and nays by a vote of more than two to one rejected his resolution. I think the vote was 14 to 33, but I may not be exactly accurate, and I hope my friend will not pick me up some other day by saying I gave the wrong figures; the book is here; but I will call it more than two to one; I am pretty safe in that. The next day Uncle Billy Allen introduced it in executive session. All Senators know what an executive session is. Of course the people in the galleries and our good friends the reporters do not know anything about it.

But somebody objected to Uncle Billy Allen's resolution, and it went down into the mass of things on the Calendar in executive session that get the go-by, as we know, every day, if I am not telling tales out of school, and that everybody forgets. The thing lay there in sleep for some months, for he introduced it in January, I think, and it was June when it was adopted. One morning evidently, Uncle Billy Allen asked to have this resolution taken up, and nobody was paying attention, as somebody here very often is not, either in public or executive sessions of the Senate about resolutions, as we know, and he got it adopted without a division. Then he got the reply of President Tyler; and then Uncle Billy Allen offered a resolution which declared that the Senate was entitled to that information, which was true, in my opinion. Then the majority of the Senate that had voted more than two to one that they did not want that information, having allowed this resolution to go without knowing it, and not being willing to say that the Senate was not entitled to it, but knowing and believing that it was, put off Uncle Billy Allen by laying his resolution on the table instead of rejecting it. That is the end of Billy Allen and Tyler. I do not think that will make much of a precedent.

Here we are, then, Mr. President, with this situation: The Senate of the United States having before it a nomination stated by the President of the United States in his own language to be of one man to supersede another suspended, and having nothing else before it, asks the Attorney-General or commands him, which is the better phrase, and is the phrase of the resolution, as all its predecessors had done, to send to the Senate what? Not any private or confidential letters, whether you call them official or unofficial, but to send to the Senate information, papers, and documents that concerned and illustrated the management and conduct of an office. Our friends on the other side have said, I believe, that we have made it too short, that is, that it only covered a year, and that if it had covered three years something would have been found to the detriment of Duskin. On the other hand, the President says and the Attorney-General says that it is too long, that we ought not to have asked for anything before the time when Burnett, the new official, took charge. Why did they not answer that, then? But I am bound to say for the honor of the President and of the Attorney-General that they never thought of resorting to that kind of pettifogging. They did not put it on the ground that we had not asked for enough, because they perfectly well knew that if there was more in the official papers of that Department that would bear on the question they had a perfect and lawful right to send it, as they do every day about every Department without our calling for it at all. And yet the Attorney-General under the direction of the President tells us that he will not inform the Senate what this man whom we are asked to appoint has been doing in his office for six months. The committee was fair. It took six months of one and six of the other, and that without any study about it, but to cover a period of time so that we could see how that office was. The President will not tell us; the Attorney-General will not tell us what this new man in for six months, bound by law to make reports that must be on file if he is fit to be there at all, has been doing. No; we can not have that.

Where are we then, sir? We come back again, broader than all Duskins and all these six hundred and forty-three people, to the right of either House of Congress to see and to know as a political department of this Government everything that officially exists in any of the Executive Departments. I repeat, sir, so that there can be no misapprehension about it, that the Attorney-General in his reply, under the direction of the President (which the President had no right to give under the law and he no right to receive) does not hint or intimate that he declines to produce these papers on the ground that they are private or confidential or unofficial, but only that being public papers rightfully on file there as public papers, because the august eye of the President of the United States has taken them into consideration for his purposes, we can not take them into consideration for ours. That is where it stands.

Now, sir, I must be done with this business. I stated a day or two ago that the question of removal has nothing to do with the question we have before us, for the President in every instance has sent his nominations as he lawfully should, without regard to whether the law be constitutional or not, pursuant to law. He has stated that he did it pursuant to this law; he has stated that every suspension and every designation has been subject to every statute that bore upon the subject. We come back to the question whether in considering these subjects of public interest and public service it is within the competence of the executive branch of the Government, the head of a Department, to say this information is denied and it is denied as of right and as of constitutional law, so that in the long future of the Republic setting this once as a precedent acquiesced in, neither House of Congress can ask for anything that exists in the Departments and get it save at the grace and favor of the autocrat who presides over it. I say that this is monstrous; I say it is destructive of every principle that we understand in regard to constitutional government of the people; and I say it is of infinitely more importance than whether these six hundred and forty-three or six thousand and forty-three officers or every officer in the United States comes or goes, because it affects the fundamental structure and balance and security that belongs to a government of the people and for the people, that their representatives may know what is the condition, not of private and confidential papers, but the condition of public affairs in respect of the administration of the various departments of the Government. There is no part of its administration that is not executive. The legislative power does not administer government; it expresses will, and therefore there is no distinction between the power of the President of the United States under this law, good or bad, to suspend, and his power to do any other act that is necessary to carry into execution the laws of the United States; and therefore if you deny information as to one, you may and must deny it as to all except at the grace and favor of the person who happens to be your Chief Magistrate.

Mr. President, there has been considerable said about motives and pretexts, and I confess I was rather pained to hear my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JACKSON], whose usual candor and justice is so conspicuous, if I correctly understood him, refer to this matter as being a pretext for keeping certain Republicans in office and excluding certain Democrats on that account. That is entirely unjust. It can not be supported by the slightest scintilla of proof. The truth is exactly the other way. I think as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary I have received in the course of this session perhaps two or three or four or five hundred letters from various of these officials and others in the United States on the topic; all citizens, a great many of them Democrats, not a majority, a great many of them these very officers themselves; and supposing I have received a hundred from these officers, and I rather think I am safe in saying that, but I do not want to be picked up by my friend from West Virginia saying I have got it one too much, call it ten, if you please—there is not (and I think my Republican colleagues will bear me out with regard to their own correspondents) an instance, or if it be so it is such a rare exception as to illustrate and fortify and enforce the rule, where any one of the suspended officials has complained that he was turned out or was to be suspended or to be turned out because he was a Republican, or who has expressed his desire to stay in. He has only put up the piteous, and as it seems the hopeless appeal for fair play. That is what he wants, and he does not get it.

And to enforce and fortify what I have said in regard to the attitude of the Republicans, I think I am justified, I am sure I am because it is within the order of the Senate, in showing to you, Mr. President, that early in this session when in the Committee on the Judiciary new gentlemen had come, welcome and able and upright, of the other party, who had not as we might fairly suppose been acquainted with the historic conduct of Democrats and Republicans in that committee before, its chairman took the earliest opportunity to call the attention of that committee to its method of dealing out fair play to candidates and to people to be removed alike, as we are doing to candidates now, as everybody knows, and in respect to candidates now. If we did not do it there would be a just and complete condemnation of that committee and of the Senate if they acted in the way that this administration is acting in condemning a man without letting him know what was the trouble about his case. There is hardly a Democratic Senator who hears me that does not know in his own State and in his own experience that against some Democratic nominee, saying nothing about the removed man, there have been made accusations of one kind or another, and Democratic Senators come to the Committee on the Judiciary and ask, and they only have to ask it and they need not do that for it is our course otherwise, that this man shall know as the rules of the Senate allow us to let him know what is the substance of the complaint against him and that he is not to be rejected until he can have the fair play of a citizen of knowing what is complained of him and to make a reply. Perhaps we are wrong in all that. Perhaps we had better adopt the Democratic administration methods of carrying on the business of stabbing in the back, and assassination in the Senate as well as in the Post-Office and other Departments; but I do not think so myself.

Now, to come back, to illustrate to you how completely the Republicans of this body have been pursuing the same course that they always have been, steadily, and steadfastly, and fairly, when the new gentlemen came into the Judiciary Committee the attention of that committee was called to the fact that for these long years, almost half the life of many of them, a quarter of it of all of them, that committee had had a standing order about calling for information and papers touching removals, suspensions, appointments, and all that, because there can be no distinction between appointments and suspensions. If papers about suspensions are confidential, papers about appointments are still more so, because when you come to the appointment and selection of a person to be nominated he has no title to an office; he is not in an office; he is not capable of being tried; he is only one of a thousand having no title or claim more than any other fellow-citizen except upon his merits to the consideration of the Executive and the Senate. And yet by some strange perversity that the power that rules the world brings to bear upon people who are to destroy themselves when they ought to be destroyed, this administration, so touchy on the subject of confidential papers when an officer selected by the Government, confirmed by the Senate, commissioned by the President is accused, as close as a whitewashed grave, when some citizen who has no right or claim to an office as of right, is nominated, and there is any question about him, then the Executive finds it to be his duty and the heads of Departments find it to be their duty to send all these papers—and there are barrels of them down stairs now in our committee-rooms; and I have a right to say it because it is within the resolution of the Senate; I will not state their contents; I wish I could—barrels of them there which are to vindicate or are to overthrow the pretensions of these particular citizens.

Now, what are you going to do? When some man who has been decorated with the favor of his country by the selection of the President of the United States and the approval of the Senate with a public trust, is accused and is to be removed, the Senate can not be intrusted with any knowledge about what is said in regard to him; but when some citizen, not an officer, having no right to the place under the Constitution and the laws except as being selected among others, is brought into question, then it is recognized that it is the right and duty of the Senate to know all about that man; private papers as they are called and confidential papers, political obligation about the value and expediency of going slow in this direction and fast in the other, all come. How are you to distinguish? Of course nobody can do it, nobody undertakes to do it, nobody has undertaken to do it.

I have been getting a little off of what has been suggested, and I will come back. On the 21st of December the records of the Committee on the Judiciary show that the chairman called the attention of the committee, for the reason I have stated that there were many new Democratic members, to what had been the custom and course of the committee in respect to getting information about removals and appointments and suspensions; and accordingly there was the unanimous direction, the whole thing being stated and approved, that the chairman be instructed as by standing order that existed before—and attention was called to it for that reason—to proceed in the same way and send to the Departments for the same information as he had been accustomed to call for. At that time it had not been thought necessary by somebody in the administration, perhaps by the Postmaster-General, whose official communication has been so often referred to, and by the heads of other Departments whose official communications perhaps exist but yet have not come to light of the same character, to stop giving the representatives of the people through the States, for we are their representatives much more, seventy-six times more than the President of the United States is, the information that touched upon the topics we were to act on. And so with general consent, as of course, the committee has pursued the even tenor of its way as it had for a quarter of a century before.

And yet our Democratic friends say that by some malign influence, some desire to put obstruction in the way of this administration, we have taken a new departure. The reverse is the truth. We give to this administration—I do not speak for any others but myself—more indulgence than was given to any of its predecessors in the last twenty years as I know, because we have over and over again strained a point lest we might be misunderstood. Perhaps it was weak—I am not defending it—to put persons into official place in respect of whose fitness some of us had profound doubts, perhaps it would not be too much to say all of us.

And that brings me in that connection to say one word, and then I shall be done. My honorable friend from West Virginia has decorated me, as his Democratic colleague did, with some reflections of inconsistency in respect of my voting for and proposing or sustaining in 1869 a provision that the tenure-of-office act should be suspended for a certain number of months. So I did; I stand to it now, for in 1869, when General Grant came into the Presidency of the United States, as the documents and records and reports now show, reported long, long ago, there was such a complete demoralization of a large part of the public service, caused by the war in the first instance, and then by the administration of Mr. Johnson conducted and run by Democratic brokers for office, that the amount of embezzlements and defalcations were the majority and the rule, and I was willing, as I am suspicious that I shall be willing about three years hence, to suspend this law for a certain period in order that the penitentiary gentlemen who are proposed by this administration and their allies and friends may be got speedily rid of, as in the times of extreme Roman peril some day the Roman constitution and laws were suspended, and Marius or somebody was to be dictator for a week or a month. I have here in my hand the printed reports of the immeasurable embezzlements and defalcations of the men who came into the administration of affairs in that time.

It has been stated by the Senator from West Virginia—I shall not allude to book-makers—that here was a Republican Senate and why did you not reject them. For this reason, Mr. President: We could not tell in advance, even as well as we can tell now in the few instances we get of your penitentiary friends—we could not tell in advance what these men could do or would do or what they were; and we felt, differing from Mr. Sumner, who stuck rigidly to his principle, that he would not confirm any man if he believed a better man could be got, and would reject and reject and reject until the President was forced to select somebody in whom we had confidence. But Mr. Sumner, with that high principle, of course could not carry a majority; nobody can on such a question until the millennium comes, I suppose. They came in just as they come in now. Every Senator knows on that side, as well as this, that we have confirmed appointment after appointment with the gravest apprehensions that it would not promote the public interest. So, in 1869, believing in the value of this restriction upon the executive patronage and power which binds politicians and citizens and Senators and punishes them if they are not obedient, I was willing, as I shall be willing, I suspect, in three years from this time, to hold up this good law, as it is, for a little time, in order that, to use a Democratic phrase, the rascals might be turned out.

Mr. President, the Republican party has not wished to embarrass this administration. It believes in a republic. It believes in supporting an administration that is an administration of a government, and not the administration of spoils and thieves and lies and hypocrisy; and so far as this administration, and I hope it is very far, is desirous to administer a government, to execute laws, to promote justice and the general welfare, this administration will have the unanimous support, I am sure, of the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber; but we do not propose to commit ourselves to trickery, to hypocrisy, to fraud, to misdirection. We do not propose to commit ourselves, if we know it—and I am afraid we shall not know it—to the selection of agents who are to administer justice in certain States of this Union to which my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] referred in introducing a bill to-day, who shall not consider such transactions to be within the scope of the administration of the justice of this Republic.

We are in favor, as we always have been, when three-fourths of our friends over there were not a part of this Government, of preserving liberty, justice, equal rights, and fair play, and whether we stand or fall on these resolutions or any others we shall go steadily forward through thick and through thin, and we shall triumph in the end—for the preservation of the private rights of citizens, both civil and political, in every State of this Union. We shall go straight forward to preserve and to vindicate and to carry out the political rights of every American citizen, overthrown, swamped, and suffocated as they are in many States of this Union now. And when we have done those two things, as we shall in the end, with them we shall try, in spite of Democratic opposition, to give to the labor of the people of the United States, which is its capital, which is its wealth, that protection and encouragement and success that belongs to the labor which is the capital of every honest workingman of the United States.

Now, then, you can carry on your administration by secret methods; you can carry it on, it may be, as very likely you will, because we all know how such things go, by sweeping away the reputations of a great number of your fellow-citizens, with no right on their part to be heard; you can carry on your administration by assumptions of executive power, which in other respects as regards foreign relations and as regards the administration of the post-office affairs of this Government, are in the face of the law and of the Constitution; you may usurp everything now; but it will not be a great while, I trust and believe, before all things will rectify themselves; and this mission that we are trying to do, whether through good report or evil report, whether we stand or fall upon these resolutions or any others, that is the promotion of the interests that I have stated, will be accomplished.

Mr. HARRIS. Before the Senator from Vermont takes his seat I desire to repeat a question that I propounded this morning. These resolutions, if I understand them, propose the establishment of a rule to control the action of the Senate in a class of cases. For my own information I desire to have the construction of the Senator from Vermont as to the third resolution. Does it mean that in all cases of nominations to fill vacancies occasioned by suspension or removal, where documents and papers in respect to the officer suspended or removed have been demanded and not sent forward by the executive department, the Senate shall refuse to consider such nomination altogether, or does it mean that in that case it is the duty of the Senate to reject the nominee without inquiry as to his merits, without looking at him at all, without inquiry as to his qualifications—to reject him alone because all the papers demanded have not been furnished? I would be glad to have the construction of the Senator from Vermont on that important point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think it needs much construction.

Mr. HARRIS. It does to me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That may be.

Mr. HARRIS. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The language would seem to be somewhat clear, and it is this simple proposition, and I should have said in a country school where I was brought up that it would amount nearly to an axiom, that where a body is called upon to act upon a question and can not get the information that is necessary for its action, it will not act. I should have imagined that in most of the New England countries—I do not know how many schools they have in Tennessee—that would be a proposition which could scarcely be open to dispute. That is exactly what the resolution says, that when the Senate of the United States, not in its committees in informal ways, &c., but when this whole body, composed of Democrats and Republicans, is of opinion that certain information in regard to a point it is called on to act upon is necessary to that action, and it can not get it, then it will refuse to agree to what the President proposes, for that reason.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Vermont knows quite as well as, nay, better than, I that when the President of the Senate puts the question, if the question is ever to be put, it is "Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?" That is the question and the only question that is propounded to the Senate. The Constitution gives the President the power to nominate and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint certain officials. The President has nominated. The duty and the onus is upon the Senate to advise and consent, or refuse to advise and consent; but refusing to advise and consent in the sense of what I conceive to be the constitutional duty of the Senate is not non-action; it is to consider, it is to determine whether this nomination shall be confirmed or rejected, and that determination based upon the merits of the nominee. But perhaps I am in error in that as I was in my want of education in not comprehending the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the trouble with my friend from Tennessee. There are a hundred years of history against him on the point as he states it, because, beginning with the administration of Mr. G. Washington, whom the Senator may have heard of, and coming down to this time, it has always happened that a considerable proportion, of course usually a small one, but a proportion of nominations have not been acted upon; and in recent years when offices are so numerous and nominations are, therefore, so many, it happens that every session of the Senate, for one cause or another, always presumably good cause, we do not act at all. But that is really apart from the point of the Senator which I wish to meet with the utmost frankness of statement, so far as I am concerned.

The proposition of the third resolution is just simply this, and it seems to me to be mathematical, that when the Senate of the United States, composed of seventy-six representatives of thirty-eight States, is of opinion and resolves accordingly that certain information is necessary to its action upon a certain question, and that information being duly called for is refused, the Senate must decline to go forward and do the thing that is proposed. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CALL. Before the Senator from Vermont closes this debate, as the Senator is such a lover of fair play, honesty, and truth, I desire to ask him if he does not think it proper that he should state the fact before the debate closes that there has been no concealment of any paper, public or private, in any of the Departments of this Government by authority of the President or the Attorney-General, but that they are open to the inspection of all Senators and all members of Congress; and the further fact that the reply of the Attorney-General to this resolution refuses no public document, no private document, but states that all have been sent to the Senate that relate to appointment; only those relating to the suspension of Duskin are retained in the office. So the question between the Senate and the President and Attorney-General grows simply out of the fact that the President claims that his constitutional right and his power, under the act of 1869, of suspension is a discretionary power with which the Senate has nothing to do; and he does not place it, nor does the Attorney-General, upon the ground of withholding or concealing any information that is of importance to the Senate in any respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. VAN WYCK], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the third resolution:

And in all such cases the removal or matter of confirmation shall be considered in open session of the Senate.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senate has now been engaged some three weeks in discussing in open session what heretofore would probably have belonged to an executive session of the Senate, and I think it will be conceded that the Republic has suffered no detriment by reason of the discussion. I presume a great majority of the Senate would concur in opinion that the country at large would have sustained great loss had not this discussion been held with open doors.

Mr. President, I fail to see, now that the general debate has been closed and we are to proceed to vote upon the confirmation or rejection of Duskin's successor, what detriment the Republic would suffer by taking that vote in open session. From the wording of the resolution referred to a moment ago by the Senator from Tennessee it would seem that this is a continuing resolution, and that it of itself does precisely the same thing which would have been consummated by a vote upon the question of the confirmation of Duskin's successor. The resolution determines, settles substantially, the question as much as if we proceeded at once to ballot on the confirmation; and yet we have been discussing the resolution in open session. Now, to make this harmonious and to make it consistent it would seem that an amendment would be necessary either on the part of the Committee on the Judiciary or on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator pardon me for a word?

Mr. VAN WYCK. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make known to the Senator that I mean to raise a point of order upon his amendment at the proper time. I will not, unless he prefers to have it raised now, interfere with his remarks.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I think I prefer that the Senator should not make it now, as I anticipate what the point will be. [Laughter.] I prefer making my remarks in open session.

Mr. HOAR. I do not wish to cut off the Senator.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator is very kind. I think it is well for me to retain the floor for a few minutes. In the last three or four years I have been thrown off it a good many times by the very motion which the Senator proposes to make.

This resolution needs an amendment to make it perfect. I think if the attention of the Judiciary Committee had been called to it, it would have been put there by themselves; but as they are inexperienced in this branch of business, as it is a new commencement to lift such questions out of secret meetings, they may be excused for not putting in their resolution all that was really necessary. Therefore I trust they will receive the suggestions I make in the spirit in which they are made. They will make the resolution better than it is. Of course they must be looked upon as doing very well for a beginning. If the third resolution means nothing why was it added? Why not rest on the second resolution, that was condemnatory of the President and the Department of Justice for refusing papers? Why not stop there? But it goes on affirmatively and asks for action on the state of facts which is set forth in the report and resolutions. The committee propose action here, and final action. They ask it by vote of the Senate, which will be the same in effect as a vote on the confirmation of this man; and they say what?

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

As I understand, this is a direction in open session to the secret session of what is the Senate's duty under certain circumstances when deliberating in secret session. Will you tell me why it is not proper, manifestly proper, to claim that the action on that case, instead of being in secret session, shall be in open session of the Senate? We say here affirmatively what the secret session shall do; it is instructed by this body; and when in secret session we shall be compelled to go back into open session and have this matter reconsidered and different action had unless this is followed. Is a secret session to be subject to instruction by an open session? This resolution applies to a certain class of cases. Then all those cases should be considered in open session. There is no limit to this resolution. It does not say for this session or this Congress; or is it to last during the lifetime of this administration?

Now, if the Senate will excuse me, I propose to consume about five minutes, and then I will yield to our friend from Massachusetts to make his point of order.

The judgment of mankind is always for the greatest publicity in matters appertaining to the creation of laws or the administration of government, and for honest treatment and fair play by the government toward its employés; hence the people, without caring what Jackson did, or Clay said, or Webster thought, believe that, when the dogma of a party or the creed of a President declares that no officer shall be removed before expiration of his term except for cause, common justice requires the cause should exist, affecting integrity, fitness, and ability, and not a pretense, whether in the guise of offensive partisanship or any other equally weak.

They believe when an officer is removed for cause he should be apprised and have the opportunity to make defense, and thus remove any reproach or stain. In the same spirit of fairness they believe the President should without reserve open to the inspection of the Senate any and all official papers which he considered in ascertaining the cause.

The question is not as to the power of the President to make removals or suspensions—that is conceded—but shall the Senate, clothed by the Constitution with equal power where action is necessary to the installment in office, who really have power to veto and override his appointments, who in one sense are his superior, be entitled to all the official information not only touching the appointee but the office itself?

But the President refuses; he views the matter from a different standpoint. What then? There is really no question of principle that affects the bulwarks of constitutional liberty or is subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government. It is purely a question of administration and policy. But he stubbornly refuses to send the papers. What then? Shall he be impeached? That is not proposed. But we engage in a winter's campaign by eloquent and vigorous approaches to attack the citadel of executive prerogative, and practically at the close, in military language, the President "holds the fort." What then?

Do we desire the people shall understand that the President observes not the dogma of his party and his own declarations in favor of civil service reform? They know that already. They know that no previous administration yielded a devoted loyalty to the new dispensation. Except that portion which recognizes the right of an office-holder to serve until the limit provided by law is reached, is a sickly plant principally of New England growth and culture, buffeted by each party when in power, is badly torn when caught in the cyclone produced by positive and negative forces of an outgoing and incoming administration. But what then?

Can we do more than hurl at the President carefully drawn resolutions, which will have as much practical result as firing the pope's bull at the comet, and under the racket of our own fulminations retire from sight, shut the doors in face of the nation whose presence we have invited, and confirm the President's appointments, unless for some reasons outside the official papers they should be rejected? Hence it was, Mr. President, while seeking to gently uncover the President to public gaze, it seemed inconsistent and equally untenable after making a fruitless effort in that direction to withdraw the Senate from the publicity to which it had invited the President. It will not do, after denouncing the President's action as a star-chamber proceeding, to abruptly banish the people from this Chamber, slam our ponderous doors in the face of the nation, drop far down into the depth of silence from which the Senator from Vermont can not so eloquently appeal to "our friends in the reporters' gallery," as he touchingly refers to them. For many years the people have been demanding that the Senate doors should be kept open, as well as the file-rooms of the Executive Departments.

In the consideration of tariff commissioners, consideration of treaty with Spain, reciprocity treaty with Mexico, passing portion of an appropriation bill to squander $250,000 for a Nicaraguan canal scheme, in all which the entire nation, without regard to politics, were interested, the Senate withdrew into its star-chamber recess and denied to the people all information of the advantages to be gained. Neither was the President taken into its counsels. The people who demand no secrecy and an open hand from the President also demand open sessions by the Senate. It would be well, if possible, to have these reforms of President and Senate proceed pari passu. For this discussion the doors are thrown open. Why this special and limited concession granted to the people? The country will congratulate itself upon this entering-wedge into the hinges of the closed doors. But why close the doors as we near the point where the people will take the most lively interest to know how the hop, skip, and jump dexterity is managed—where from denouncing the President and condemning the Attorney-General we ring down the curtain, blow out the lights, and at last, reappearing from time to time with bland smiles and graceful bows to the public, gently intimating now you see it and now you don't see it, with the President's appointments duly confirmed?

The public are advised by a resolution adopted in open Senate that not only one person but a class are openly rejected, which is supposed to be a guide to the secret sessions and to have the force of law at least to the Senate until repealed. Is not the amendment I propose entirely logical, that every case of this class so openly resolved upon shall have its completion in the same open session? Where is the consistency of dragging only the political aspect of this question before the public and then withdrawing the most important portion from their consideration?

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I think I am as heartily in favor of the consideration of nominations in open session, as a rule, as any member of the Senate can be. It is known to all that I have introduced a resolution to that effect, that it has been referred to the Committee on Rules, that it has been reported adversely from the Committee on Rules, and that I have said that I would on a proper occasion seek to call it up and to discuss it and to ask a vote upon it. I have refrained from doing so for the reason that I desired that it should in no manner become complicated with the present discussion. I wish to remove the consideration of that question from even the slightest suspicion that there is any political motive back of my resolution. I am therefore sorry that the Senator from Nebraska should have insisted upon this amendment, and I will venture, saying again that I am heartily in favor of a motion which goes further than the proposed amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, to move to lay this amendment upon the table.

Mr. BUTLER. Before that is done, I should like to explain my position.

Mr. PLATT. I withhold the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the motion?

Mr. PLATT. I will withhold it for the present.

Mr. BUTLER. I will not detain the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BUTLER. But the Senator has withdrawn it in order to enable me to state my position on the amendment.

Mr. PLATT. I merely give notice that I shall make the motion.

Mr. BUTLER. I should be very glad indeed to have an opportunity to vote for the amendment, and I say to the Senator from Connecticut now that when his proposition to amend the rules appears before the Senate I shall be very happy to vote for it. I differ with him, however, as to the time when this removal of secrecy should be adopted by the Senate. If there was ever a time in the history of this Government when the injunction of secrecy should be removed from the proceedings of the Senate, in my judgment this is the occasion. We have been talking about the star-chamber proceedings of the President and attacking him because he did not see fit to disclose to the Senate what motives influenced him in certain transactions of official conduct, and at the same time closing the doors of the Senate upon nominations which he has made here, and which, I think, I can say without violating a rule of the Senate, I should be very glad to discuss in open Senate, in order that the country might understand the reasons and the grounds assigned by a majority of the Senate for refusing to confirm nominations and carry on the Government.

Mr. PLATT. I renew my motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Connecticut indulge me for a single moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. PLATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HARRIS. As a member of the Committee on Rules I have opposed the consideration of nominations in open Senate. For reasons abundantly satisfactory to myself, which I will not now consume the time of the Senate to explain, I shall continue to oppose opening the doors of the Senate to the consideration of the nominations and confirmations. But as these resolutions, as construed by the Senator who draughted them, do not propose to deal with questions of nomination or confirmation, but only with the single question of removals, if the Senator from Nebraska will modify his amendment by striking out in the second line the words "of confirmations," then it will be pertinent to the body, spirit, letter, and meaning of the resolution to which he proposes to attach it; and if he will so modify it I shall very cheerfully vote for it if it is not laid upon the table upon the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I renew my motion.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to reserve the point of order. It seems to me that this is a motion to amend the rules, and not proposed by giving written notice a day beforehand of the particular rule or part of rule proposed to be modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can make the point of order at any time; but another question is now pending.

Mr. HOAR. I would like to have the point of order reserved until I see whether the Senate prefers this way of dealing with it.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to make a formal correction. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to make any modification when a motion to lay on the table is pending.

Mr. HOAR. I raise the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the amendment lie on the table. That proposition is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. I raise the point of order on the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion now is a motion to lay on the table. That is clearly in order.

Mr. HOAR. Then I will reserve the point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will have a right to raise his point of order at any time after this motion is decided.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is not debatable.

Mr. LOGAN. I know.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Mr. President——

Mr. PLATT. I do not yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The Senator will allow a question to be put to him, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator declines to yield.

Mr. PLATT. I have made a motion to lay on the table.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will you not allow a question to be asked?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will come to order.

Mr. VAN WYCK. Will the Senator not allow a question to be asked?

Mr. PLATT. It is not for me to say whether a question shall be asked me or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Conversation is out of order. The question is, Shall the amendment lie on the table?

Mr. BUTLER. I call for the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me I should like to say one word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to yielding to the Senator if he wishes me to do so.

Mr. COCKRELL. If the motion is not debatable how can the Senator yield?

Mr. PLATT. I withdraw the motion if the Senator from Illinois wants me to do so.

Mr. LOGAN. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not before the Senate, being withdrawn.

Mr. LOGAN. I introduced a resolution the other day opening the doors of the Senate on all questions pertaining to nominations, confirmations, and rejections. That lies on the table. I am heartily in favor of that proposition, and I would vote for this proposition if it was not for the fact that many of our friends think it would encumber the pending resolutions, and I appeal to the Senator from Nebraska to withdraw it and let us have a vote on each proposition. Inasmuch as he persists in moving it to these resolutions, I shall be compelled to vote with the Senator from Connecticut to lay it on the table for the present, so as to leave the resolutions entirely unencumbered in reference to this particular thing, and then after that I shall be very glad on either this or any other resolution of this character to have the vote of the Senate. And I will say to the Senator from South Carolina, before these particular nominations are acted on in the Senate, I shall, if a majority of the Senate will agree with me, have a vote on the resolution to have the doors of the Senate opened for all purposes pertaining to nominations and confirmations.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I desire to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee by erasing the word "confirmations."

It is true, as the Senator from Illinois has said, that he did appeal to me to withdraw this amendment. He did do that. I should have been very happy, indeed, to have gratified him in that respect. When these resolutions were propounded I saw the same difficulty in them that I have called the attention of the Senate to to-day, that there was an inconsistency and lack of harmony, because it did seem strange that we should come and stay here as long as Senators might desire to discuss the question of the sending of papers or the withholding of them by the President, that we should go so far as to have final action upon the matter by declaring in open session that the Senate had committed itself in advance to the policy of rejection, and yet take the formal vote in executive session. The Senator from Illinois does not understand it so. No understanding can be drawn from it but that the Senate by the third resolution commits itself in advance to the rejection of every case included within this class where papers are demanded in secret session and the President refuses to send them, and all the Senate has to do is to fall back and be governed by the resolution which is passed here in open sesssion.

The Senator did make that request, and I appeal to the Senator also. I appeal to him to show wherein this amendment is not consistent with the resolution itself and where this simple amendment embarrasses either the resolution or any member of the Senate. I desire any Senator to explain wherein and how this amendment can embarrass his vote or the action of the Senate or the effect of these resolutions when passed. It merely says that these resolutions when passed, which make a rule of this body in open session, shall be executed in open session; that is all; that the will and direction of the Senate shall be carried out in open session right where it was made. That is all, nothing further; and I regret exceedingly that Senators should find it necessary to turn their back upon a decision to which they are committed.

Senators have said with an air of triumph that they are committed to this principle, and a good deal more of the same kind. They say they like this, but they want it in larger doses, they want the resolution larger, to embrace all confirmations. It was proper for the Judiciary Committee in the first place; they did not halt and they were not timid about embarrassing anything by bringing this whole matter in open session and discussing this question. It was very proper, and for it we feel very grateful to them, and the country I think too will express gratitude that we have had an opportunity to know as much as we have heard in the last three weeks of the operations and business of the secret executive sessions of the Senate. But now we get to a point where we can put just as well an amendment on continuing this same thing, for it is only continuing it; we get to a point where we have final action, and now we only continue to make the application, to let in a little more light as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] suggests. That is all. The lights are turned on now, and the only occasion hereafter is to bring this light to bear right on the particular case which may be up for consideration by the Senate.

So it is entirely logical, and not only logical but it is consistent, for the Senators who believe in these resolutions of the Judiciary Committee to carry them out in this way. It is consistent emphatically and particularly for the Senators who believe in some time or other opening these doors and keeping them open long enough for the people to look in and see what is going on here to adopt my amendment. It is perfectly consistent and legitimate on a resolution declaring the same spirit, the same intent, the same purpose, and the same object, and I do not understand, though I really have been trying to fathom it, why it is there is so much sacredness about these special resolutions from the Judiciary Committee that every one must say, "Hands off.

I have understood, by the sacred traditions, the holy traditions of the Senate, that a man must not open his mouth, when the doors were open, in favor of keeping the doors open. I understand that, because it is a tradition here; but when they have set this example in our faces, when by this course the bars are broken down by this committee's report and resolutions, what is there so sacred about these resolutions that this amendment to carry them out in the same spirit when the resolutions are adopted can not be added? Where is the objection? It will not do to say that anybody will be embarrassed by this amendment. Oh, no. I am willing to withdraw the amendment if anybody can state where the embarrassment commences and where it ends, how it affects any one. I would do it cheerfully, but I think the people generally are just as anxious as I am to know wherein and how this little amendment embarrasses any man in the American Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will please state his point of order?

Mr. HOAR. My point is that this amendment is not in order, it operating as a change of the standing rules of the Senate. The second clause of Rule XXXVIII is:

> 2. All information communicated or remarks made by a Senator when acting upon nominations, concerning the character or qualifications of the person nominated, also all votes upon any nomination, shall be kept secret.

Rule XL is that—

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts how the discussion that we have been having for two or three weeks occurred in open session on executive matters?

Mr. HOAR. The resolutions which are now before the Senate merely declare a general purpose of the Senate. They do not declare anything to be enforced by the Chair or to govern us as a matter of order. It is as if we said we would not pass another railroad charter or anything of that kind. But this is something which the Chair would be obliged to enforce as one of the rules of the Senate on a question of order; that is, ordering a matter to be considered in open session.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska to be entirely germane, with the amendment made on the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, and entirely in pursuance with the line marked out by the Judiciary Committee, that this matter should be discussed in open session. I can not see why you should discuss it in part in open session, and when the proposition comes to open the doors as to other matters in the same connection it is obnoxious to a point of order.

Mr. HOAR. It is a proposition that all the Presidential removals hereafter shall be discussed in open session, making a change of the rules of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Tennessee on the point of order.

Mr. HARRIS. The question that I desired to submit to my friend from Massachusetts was that the resolutions under consideration do not appear to me to deal with any question that belongs to executive session. I do not know any rule of the Senate that makes it the duty of the Senate to consider a question of removal in executive session or any other session; and these resolutions in their terms confine themselves strictly to questions of removal, not questions of appointment. If the confirmation of an appointee was the question to be considered, the rules of the Senate do require that that shall be considered in executive session with closed doors; but I find nothing in the series of resolutions that the Senate is now considering in respect to the matter of confirmations, in respect to the consideration of any nominee or any class of nominees; but it is a controversy with one of the Executive Departments of the Government upon a subject over which I think the Senate, either in executive or open session, has no jurisdiction—the subject of removals, not of appointments, not of nominations. And therefore I do not think the amendment is out of order. I do not think the amendment proposes to change the rules of the Senate, which apply to confirmations, not to removals.

Mr. HOAR. It is manifest that this amendment if adopted is intended to mean and would be held by the Chair to mean that the Senate will consider the confirmation or the rejection of nominations which operates as a removal in open session, and therefore therein changes the rule. But I do not wish to waste the time of the Senate. I think the whole Senate want to vote.

Mr. COCKRELL. One word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will hear the Senator from Missouri, though the rule is that the question of order must be decided without debate.

Mr. COCKRELL. The latter part of the third clause of Rule XXXVI says:

> And all treaties which may be laid before the Senate, and all remarks, votes, and proceedings thereon shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy.

There is nothing in this amendment which is in conflict with any rule of the Senate so as to require it to lie over one day before it can be acted upon.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator look at Rule XXXVI, clauses first and second?

Mr. BUTLER. That refers to nominations exclusively.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no difficulty. On examination of the rule it is clear that the case falls within Rule XXXVI, which reads:

> When acting upon confidential or executive business the Senate Chamber shall be cleared of all persons except the Secretary, &c.

The communications referred to in these resolutions are executive communications, known to be such. Rule XL provides the mode and manner, and only the mode and manner, in which the rules can be changed. It seems to the Chair very clear—

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof.

It is clear that the amendment now proposed is in the nature of an amendment to a resolution in open session that would change the rules of the Senate to a certain extent, certainly to the extent of modifying the mode of dealing with the communications referred to in the paper; and as a matter of course it is very clear that the motion of the Senator from Nebraska as now made does not come before the Senate under the fortieth rule, which requires not only a day's notice, but that the notice must specify in writing precisely the rule or part of rule proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. This is certainly not done by the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska. The Chair is therefore clearly of opinion that it is not in order to thus modify the rules in this way.

Mr. BUTLER. Is it in order to appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order.

Mr. BUTLER. I appeal from the decision of the Chair and ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOAR. I move to lay the appeal on the table, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER. I am a little surprised after the Senator from Massachusetts has stated——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina has not yielded the floor.

Mr. HOAR. If I had known that the Senator from South Carolina designed to take the floor on his motion I certainly should not have made my motion, I beg to assure the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I had the floor.

Mr. HOAR. I did not know the Senator had.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina had the floor on the appeal. The Chair will state the question, and then the Senator from South Carolina will have the right to address the Senate. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? Upon that question the Senator from South Carolina has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. I simply desire to say that I wanted to appeal from the decision of the Chair and upon that have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. As many as are in favor of taking the question by yeas and nays——

Mr. HOAR. I move to lay the appeal on the table, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the duty of the Chair first to ascertain whether the yeas and nays are ordered on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the appeal lie on the table, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when Mr. COLQUITT'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] is absent, but on all questions connected with this subject-matter he is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH].

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). As just announced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN], I am paired with his colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] on all questions affecting the resolutions pending.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called). I believe my colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS].

Mr. INGALLS. I stated to the Senator from South Carolina that if no other pair could be obtained, I would very gladly pair with his colleague.

Mr. BUTLER. He is at home attending a member of his family who is very dangerously ill, and I should be very much obliged to the Senator from Kansas if he would pair with him.

Mr. INGALLS. I will consider the pair made.

Mr. BECK (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Florida, was called). The Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] is paired on all questions with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. The Senator from Florida has so advised me at least.

Mr. CULLOM (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Nevada, was called). The Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] is paired with his colleague [Mr. FAIR].

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SEWELL] on all questions involved in this matter.

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. PLATT (when his name was called). The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is detained from the Senate to-day by illness, and requested me to pair with him and I have done so, unless he is announced as having paired with some other Senator.

Mr. CONGER and others. With Senator PALMER.

Mr. PLATT. I am informed that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I have been heretofore paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], but under the circumstances of that pair I was authorized to transfer it, and I transfer the pair to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. PIKE], now absent; but as I understand a pair has been announced between the Senator from New Hamphire [Mr. PIKE] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], I vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. GEORGE. After the statement made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] I am now at liberty to vote.

Mr. INGALLS. The pair announced between the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. HAMPTON] and myself is transferred to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL], and I ask to vote.

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	Logan,	Plumb,
Allison,	Evarts,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Blair,	Frye,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Cameron,	Hale,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Chace,	Harrison,	Miller,	Stanford,
Conger,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Ingalls,	Platt,

NAYS—28.

Beck,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Berry,	Coke,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,
Brown,	George,	Kenna,	Van Wyck,
Butler,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Call,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Walthall,
Camden,	Gray,	Payne,	Wilson of Md.

ABSENT—16.

Bowen,	Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,
Colquitt,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,	Sherman,
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Vance,
Fair,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,	Vest.

So the appeal was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask for a division of the question, so that a vote may be taken on each resolution separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee asks for a separate vote on each resolution. The first resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the foregoing report of the Committee on the Judiciary be agreed to and adopted.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROWN (when Mr. COLQUITT'S name was called). I again announce the pair of my colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] on all matters connected with these resolutions. Without announcing it further, I make this announcement once for all.

Mr. BUTLER (when Mr. HAMPTON'S name was called). I desire to announce now and for the remaining votes on these resolutions that my colleague [Mr. HAMPTON] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. TELLER (when the name of Mr. JONES, of Florida, was called). My colleague [Mr. BOWEN] is paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES]. I announce it now once for all.

Mr. MCPHERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with my colleague [Mr. SEWELL] upon all questions connected with these resolutions. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I shall not announce the pair again.

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PALMER] is paired on this and all other questions connected with the resolutions with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I announce it now for all the other votes on these questions.

Mr. BLAIR (when Mr. PIKE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PIKE] is absent ill, paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, my colleague would vote "yea." I shall not make the announcement again.

Mr. COCKRELL. And if my colleague [Mr. VEST], who is detained from the Senate Chamber by sickness, were here, he would vote "nay" on all these resolutions. So I desire to have him recorded as in the negative on all of them.

Mr. RANSOM (when Mr. VANCE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER]. If my colleague were here, he would vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. INGALLS. I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. BECK. I desire to announce that the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] is paired upon all these resolutions with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Cameron,	Hale,	Miller,	Spooner,
Chace,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Conger,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Teller,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Platt,	Van Wyck,
Dawes,	Logan,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.

NAYS—26.

Beck,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Berry,	Coke,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Voorhees,
Brown,	George,	Kenna,	Walthall,
Butler,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Wilson of Md.
Call,	Gorman,	Morgan,
Camden,	Gray,	Payne,

ABSENT—17.

Bowen,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,	Vest.
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Fair,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,

So the first resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the second resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate hereby expresses its condemnation of the refusal of the Attorney-General, under whatever influence, to send to the Senate copies of papers called for by its resolution of the 25th of January, and set forth in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, as in violation of his official duty and subversive of the fundamental principles of the Government and of a good administration thereof.

Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. CONGER (when Mr. PALMER'S name was called). I announced before the pair of my colleague [Mr. PALMER] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], but I did not state how he would vote. On the former resolution and on this whole series of resolutions my colleague, if present, would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. SEWELL] on these resolutions would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay." I am paired with him.

Mr. RANSOM. I should have stated that if my colleague [Mr. VANCE] was here he would vote "nay."

Mr. BROWN. I desire to make the same statement in reference to my colleague [Mr. COLQUITT], who is paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present, on all these resolutions he would vote "nay," and I understand the Senator from Oregon would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—32.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Cameron,	Hale,	Miller,	Spooner,
Chace,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Conger,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Teller,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Platt,	Van Wyck,

Fair,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Saulsbury,

So the second resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The third resolution will be reported.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to proposed removals of officers, the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of whom are withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Mr. GRAY. I rise to a point of order. I understood the Chair to rule on the point of order before taken that the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska was relating to executive business, and possibly contravening a rule of the Senate which can not be changed except on one day's notice. I make now a point of order in the same line, that this resolution, inasmuch as it undertakes to deal with nominations made to the Senate by the Executive en masse, by declaring that it is the duty of the Senate to refuse to advise and consent to a certain class of nominations, is within the objection made in reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska; and therefore it is out of order. In other words, we are attempting to do in open session, without notice, precisely what belongs to the executive session, and to repeal or to abrogate a rule of the Senate by declaring beforehand that it is the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to a certain class of nominations. I can not see wherein the difference lies between refusing the advice and consent to nominations in a lump and refusing the advice and consent of the Senate to nominations in detail. I therefore make the point of order that this is in contravention of the rules of the Senate in regard to executive business and in substance making a new rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the point of order is not well taken. The resolution is simply a declaration of opinion adopted in the form of a resolution, and does not change in the slightest degree the mode of proceeding or action of the Senate in executive session or in public session. It is simply a declaration of opinion of the Senate. Therefore the Chair is compelled to overrule the point of order. Does the Senator take an appeal?

Mr. GRAY. With all respect I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware appeals from the decision of the Chair and asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I did not intend to take any further part in this debate; but inasmuch as this resolution is to be adopted, and to apply to the question of the confirmation of a nomination of a citizen of Alabama, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to it. This resolution, if adopted, makes a rule by the voice of the Senate to govern us in executive session on the confirmation of Mr. Burnett.

I believe that it is the duty of every Senator to obey the commands and orders of this body, especially when those commands are in the form of a resolution which amounts to a rule. I do not know of any right on my part to take exception to a rule of the Senate, and I think I have been uniformly consistent in yielding obedience to the rules. That is one of the very highest duties that belong to the constituent elements of this body.

Now we adopt a rule that applies to action on the nomination of Mr. Burnett. It is that we will agree in advance that Mr. Burnett's nomination to this body is not to be considered in executive session because we have alleged that the President has refused to communicate some information in respect to the removal of Mr. Duskin, or that the President has omitted to perform or refused to perform a duty incumbent upon him to communicate information to the Senate in regard to facts relating to the removal of Mr. Duskin from office, and that therefore we will not act upon the question of Mr. Burnett's nomination.

Mr. BROWN. There is so much noise in the Chamber that we can not hear the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please come to order. Conversation must be suspended.

Mr. MORGAN. I am advised by the rules of the Senate that when a nomination is sent to us in executive session I have the right to move for the confirmation of the nominee, and any other Senator has a right to move for his rejection; but if this resolution is adopted I am cut off from that privilege. The Senate of the United States is now deciding Mr. Burnett's case. It would be a contradiction and would stultify the Senate if after the adoption of this resolution we should go into executive session and thereupon take up the question of his confirmation and decide it favorably to him.

I therefore submit that the point of order has been well taken, that we are not to be cut off from the privilege that belongs to us in executive session by an alteration in the rules of the Senate, or by an alteration in the condition of a nominee who comes before the Senate, which is proposed to be enacted by this resolution whenever it is adopted.

I am aware of the eagerness to invade the province of the President of the United States with respect to some of his constitutional powers. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts said that it was conceded by nine-tenths, I believe, of the members of this body on the other side of the Chamber that the power of removal was in the President. We are overstepping the laws of propriety and overstepping the laws we have laid down for ourselves when we consider and determine a fact in the open session of the Senate that is absolutely conclusive upon the rights of a nominee of the President to have his nomination considered in the executive sessions of this body.

I am not at liberty with my colleague to bring forward the President's recommendations of Mr. Burnett. It is a subject which we are not permitted to refer to, because we can not get the evidence before the Senate from the committee in reference to the worthiness of this gentleman for this office. We are in open legislative session now; not having a single point of similarity or resemblance to an executive session and not belonging to the class of business that under our rules we are to consider in executive session. We are brought before a legislative session of this body to consider and to pass on a report and resolutions the necessary effect of which is to prevent us in executive session from calling up and considering the right of Mr. Burnett to be confirmed or to be rejected, our duty to reject him, I will say, upon the facts and merits of the case, which we have no right to consider in this open session.

It is not for me to remark upon this attitude of the Senate nor to characterize this as a deliberate wrong against a man, after nearly a month of debate on this question, but I do regard it as an injustice to a constituent whom I have the honor in part to represent on this floor in depriving him of those rights which belong to every other citizen of this American country, the right to have freedom of speech for his representatives here as to his nomination on the merits of his claim to this office under a nomination made by the President. That right we have not. I can not look here to the question of the fitness of Mr. Burnett. I can not show here how he has conducted himself in this office. I can not bring letters from his friends and lay them before the Senate in executive session in order to show that you are committing an injustice on this man in order to make a political point in this matter. Here we take the rights of a citizen of this country, and in order to make a point upon the President or the Attorney-General we strike him down by a resolution that it suits us to consider in open session. That is the attitude of the Senate of the United States.

Why should this august body, which has won for itself such honors in the past, lend itself with all its powers and influences into the hands of a political party for the purpose of advancing the interests of that party and denying justice to a citizen? Sir, upon this question I have frequently put the proposition, and so have other Senators, to the honorable Senators on the other side, who can not state in the eyes of the country an answer to it, what do you propose to do here with the Attorney-General? Do you propose to impeach him? Do you propose to put him on trial before this country on allegations which when formulated against Andrew Johnson were considered by this very body as being sufficient to impeach him if he had been found guilty and removed from his high office? Do you propose to punish the Attorney-General of the United States for a contempt of your authority? The honorable Senator from Vermont evidently endeavored to avoid an answer to this question. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who sits behind him on that committee, evidently avoided an answer to this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What was the question?

Mr. MORGAN. The honorable Senator will have to look to the record to find it. I do not propose to be trifled with by the honorable Senator from Vermont. He understands the question. This question has not been answered. It has been put by several Senators on this side of the Chamber. Do you mean to impeach the Attorney-General of the United States of having committed a crime against the Constitution and laws? Do you mean to assert over him a power the assertion of which dropped incautiously from the lips of the honorable Senator from Vermont this evening when be said, if I understood him aright, that the Senate of the United States had the right to put the Attorney-General in jail for refusal of obedience to its command. I hope the honorable Senator understands that question. Is the resolution we are about to adopt now a mere declaration of our view, our opinion, our construction of Constitution and law; or is it a condemnation of and a denunciation against the Attorney-General, which, if I rightly understood, the Senator from Vermont asserted this evening in his remarks would give us the right, if we chose to exercise it, of confining the Attorney-General in jail for contempt of our authority? Does the honorable Senator rise to take exception to it? He is silent. He turned to this side of the Chamber and asked whether we, whether any Senator, whether any one on this side would rise to say a certain thing. Now, understanding the personal responsibility of the Senator from Vermont, I ask him the question, did he mean to say and does he now mean to say that this body has got the right to take the Attorney-General of the United States and imprison him for having refused to answer the demands made upon him in this resolution?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be rather sorry to prolong this debate with my distinguished friend from Alabama, but I am bound to say, for the progress of constitutional liberty and law in this country, that if any officer of the United States, excepting the President—about which I go into no discussion now—is lawfully bound to answer a demand of either House of Congress, either by its authority to a committee or by its direct order to appear and do whatever, when he fails to do it he is liable to be punished for a contempt.

Mr. MORGAN. Now the honorable Senator from Vermont has in this resolution, of which he is the author and the father, declared that the Attorney-General of the United States is lawfully bound to make this communication, does he not?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Most decidedly. I have not the slightest doubt about it.

Mr. MORGAN. He has not the slightest doubt about it. Therefore the Senator from Vermont, and the Senate of the United States in following his lead, will in these resolutions, as I understand him—and I do not misunderstand him—declare that the Senate of the United States upon this question, upon this issue made now upon the facts set out in this report, has the right to call him before this body and imprison him for contempt. Now we have it. We have not had it before. There has been a great deal of special pleading about this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think there is a great deal.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; and the honorable Senator from Vermont is responsible for nearly the whole of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I started it, undoubtedly.

Mr. MORGAN. The question now has come to a point, and the Senate in the adoption of this resolution is going to assert the doctrine that it has the power to enforce against the Attorney-General of the United States imprisonment—and I know not what else—for a contempt of this demand made on him by the Senate, and yet we are told this does not involve a great constitutional question. We are told that this is a mere quibbling demand, made with respect to the rights of the Senate to determine whether papers that are demanded are official or unofficial.

Mr. President, I say that you can not reach the Attorney-General in the purpose now at last disclosed, at the expense of a constituent of mine in the State of Alabama, by a prejudgment of the Senate in open session of his right to an office which the President of the United States has nominated him to and put him in possession of and required him to give bond for, required him to take an oath to execute it, and of which he is now in the full possession. You can not under the rules of the Senate take away the right that belongs to me and my colleague to ask the Senate to consider his merits. We violate that rule; we set it at defiance; and the Senator from Vermont, having concealed during this long debate the actual purpose of this resolution, which was to lay a predicate upon which we might hereafter proceed to arrest the Attorney-General and bring him before the Senate, has, in his eager endeavor thus to prostrate Constitution, law, and the rules of the Senate, cut off Mr. Burnett from his right to have his Senators consider with the other Senators in executive session his claim to this office. That is my assertion.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BECK. I desire to ask him if there is not some force in the fact that no question was made in regard to this until after the term of Mr. Duskin had expired as shown by the commission that he held.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes, Mr. President, there is great force in it, it seems to me conclusive force in it; and if the majority of the Judiciary Committee had been seeking to know anything about Mr. Burnett they would have found out that fact; but Mr. Burnett was the last of all their thoughts. He was not a shadow upon their path. Mr. Burnett's rights or Mr. Duskin's rights were not considered in the case at all; and this world knows, it can not fail to know, that the whole object and purpose of this inquiry is to determine whether or not Mr. Garland and the President should give up to the Senate certain matters that the Senate pretended that it wanted to know and never did want to know a word about.

Mr. HOAR. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I protest that the Senator from Massachusetts is disposed to cut off debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You have had it all on your side.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Yes; and if the Senator from Vermont will permit the suggestion, we are busily engaged in trying to induce it to come from the other side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CULLOM in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts withdraw his motion to allow the Senator from Kentucky to be heard?

Mr. HOAR. I am very unwilling, of course, if the Senator from Kentucky desires to take the floor, to cut off debate; but I supposed that the motion that I made was in the interest of the comfort of the whole Senate after this matter has been debated for three weeks. But I will withdraw the motion, giving notice, however, that after the Senator from Kentucky has concluded I will renew the motion if the Chair recognizes me for that purpose. That will leave two arguments on that side.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I acknowledge the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts, for which I was prepared.

I desire, Mr. President, to remind the Senate that the question pending here, as I understand, is upon an appeal taken from the ruling of the Chair made upon a point of order raised which reaches to the resolution now under consideration. I shall endeavor not to go outside of or wander away from the question that is fairly pending. I have taken no part in the discussion that for weary weeks, stretching now into months, the Senate has been forced even unwillingly to endure, believing as I did that however the Senate might seek to delude itself, the country was not to be deceived, but knew what the issue involved was, and thoroughly comprehended it, and had long since grown sick and tired of it, I for one spared my comrades in this Chamber the infliction of a speech.

I come now to discuss nothing except the point of order which is raised on the appeal which has been made from the decision of the Chair, and I beg the attention of Senators present and the Chair itself while I shall endeavor, as fairly as I can, and in as few words as possible, to state the case as it appears to me. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska was obnoxious to the point of order raised against it by the Senator from Massachusetts, I know no process of logic and no suggestion of consistency that would protect this resolution from the renewal of that point of order as submitted by the Senator from Delaware.

I ask the Chair to tell me now, suppose the appeal be laid on the table, as the Senator from Massachusetts notifies us that he means to move, what will be the result? A gentleman nominated by the Executive of this country to perform the functions of a public office will be denied what the rules of the Senate guarantee him, the right to have his nomination considered and discussed in executive session. There is no escape from that conclusion.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BLACKBURN. With great pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska, it was to order that all nominations of a certain class, in substance—I do not now deal with the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee——

Mr. HARRIS. Removals, not nominations.

Mr. HOAR. I understand, but I suppose it means that nominations which are to effectuate or operate as removals shall be considered in open session. If that had been adopted that would be a rule of this body to be enforced by the Chair as a matter of order, and would have repealed another rule of this body which is now enforced by the Chair as a matter of order. The present resolution is a mere declaration of what the Senate should consider its duty in future to do, just as if the Senate should pass a resolution that it would be our duty to reject all bills granting lands to railroad companies hereafter. The Chair could not deal with that as a rule of the Senate or enforce it as a matter of order, but it would be merely a declaration of the purpose of individual Senators.

But what I chiefly rose to say, if the Senator will pardon me, is that I do not construe the resolutions as the Senators on the other side seem to do. If we pass them, speaking for one—my name is signed to the report and I expect to vote for the resolutions—I shall be ready to proceed at the next executive session to consider and dispose of this very Burnett case, Duskin having gone out of office. I understand the meaning of the resolutions to be that the Senate will not proceed to consider and act upon such cases where the information they require is necessary to their understanding or to making up of the case, but if the case be made up or understood by the Senate from other sources, as probably three-fourths of these suspension cases will be, I expect to go on and deal with them and dispose of them promptly and in order, and I do not understand that anything in the resolutions stands in my way.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I will ask if that be the purpose of the Senator from Massachusetts what necessity is there for the passage of the resolution; and I would say further, with the Senator's permission—and I will yield to him with pleasure at any moment—that there is not a Senator who sits upon that side of the Chamber in whose fairness of conduct I repose more confidence or look to with more hope than I do to his—if the Senator from Massachusetts speaks for the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary and expresses his readiness and purpose to proceed in executive session to-day or to-morrow to consider and dispose of the nomination of this man Burnett, I ask why pass the resolution? If the Senator will permit me and the Chair will bear with me, I ask what would be the difference? Instead of using the general terms which I find constituting the resolution, suppose you make the resolution specific, and instead of taking in a whole class of cases let us make it apply to this one case.

I assume that the Senate is now satisfied, on the face of the official declaration, that the papers demanded in this case are not to be surrendered nor furnished to this body. Everybody knows that. They are not coming. The head of one of the Executive Departments of the Government under the sanction of a Presidential message has told you that they would not be sent. They will not be sent here and all of us know that. Now, then, make your resolution specific and see how it would read:

> That it is, under these circumstances, the duty of the Senate to refuse its advice and consent to the proposed removal of Mr. Duskin, the documents and papers in reference to the supposed official or personal misconduct of himself having been withheld by the Executive or any head of a Department when deemed necessary by the Senate and called for in considering the matter.

Before this point of order and this appeal shall be disposed of, let me ask is it possible for you, sir, to conceive of any change or alteration of rule that is more radical, more sweeping, more unjust, more indefensible, than that which is proposed by this resolution? Here are the rules of this body adopted for its government, and among them in Rule XXXVIII; in the very first clause I find the following:

> When nominations shall be made by the President of the United States to the Senate, they shall, unless otherwise ordered, be referred to the appropriate committees; and the final question on every nomination shall be, "Will the Senate advise and consent to this nomination?" which question shall not be put on the same day on which the nomination is received, nor on the day on which it may be reported by a committee, unless by unanimous consent.

That the Senate shall advise and consent to this nomination is the peremptory order and rule of the Senate. Pass the resolution, and you have abrogated that rule and declared that that question shall not be submitted. I submit in common candor whether there is an atom of necessity, whether there is any defense, or any excuse, or any palliation to be offered for the insincerity of the act of going into executive session to determine the fate of Mr. Burnett after that resolution has been adopted here in open session. Whether he be a worthy or an unworthy man, whether there be a vacancy or whether there be no vacancy, whether the term of his office had expired and ended by its own limitation or not, whether the President acted wisely or unwisely, whether he exceeded the bounds of his authority as measured by the Constitution or not, here is an American citizen standing before the bar of the Senate bearing a commission of decency, prima facie, in the shape of a commission from the President of the United States to discharge the functions of an honorable office, a nomination constituting a commission as to character. The rule of the Senate says that he shall have the right of consideration, even though it be with closed doors. This resolution denies it to him and says that he shall not have it.

If this resolution is passed it practically bars this citizen of his right as guaranteed to him by the precedents and secured to him by the rules of the Senate; and not only him, but all the other nominations that come in the class designated by the resolution; and yet we are told that it does not change the rule of the Senate. It not only changes the rule of the Senate by a method that is surreptitious and insincere and unfair, but it violates every precedent known to this country from the foundation of the Government till now. It is an unmanly method of avoiding a contest by which you can deprive an American citizen of the rights guaranteed to him by law, by rule, by precedent, and by decency.

Mr. BECK. I wish to suggest to my colleague that after this resolution is passed we shall still have reserved to us the right to clear the galleries and close the doors.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Certainly. With all deference and with the fullest measure of respect, for indeed I cherish it for the Senator from Massachusetts, I will say in advance to him that a motion to lay the appeal upon the table is hardly a respectful answer to a question which in all respect, in all candor, and in all sincerity I submit. If the appeal shall be laid upon the table and the resolution be adopted, tell me, pray, in common fairness, what substantial right has this nominee of the President to this office either under the law or the rule or the precedents of this body? Is it possible that the conceded, the compact, the never-failing but ever-responding majority who sit upon the other side of this Chamber is growing doubtful?

Can it be true that political disintegration on that side is apprehended? The power is conceded; the votes are here, and they always are here, it does not matter, though you may tear into shreds and tatters the whole framework of the rules under which this august body for so many years has transacted its business. Are there such exigencies, are there such necessities confronting our friends upon the other side as to force them to do this thing in almost indecent haste, when they can reach the same results and accomplish the same purpose, however destitute of justice, if they will only contain their souls in peace and go at it after a regular and formulated fashion?

I do not believe that it is the purpose of the majority which sits upon the other side, even though it be necessary, to use haste. I do not believe that the Senate is willing or will declare itself willing, leaving this whole question of papers out of view, to do a violence and make a rent in the organism under which this body lives and transacts its business for such a paltry advantage as this seems to me to promise to be.

Mr. HOAR. I now move to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. BUTLER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. GIBSON. I have been requested to state that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] is paired with his colleague [Mr. SEWELL].

Mr. INGALLS. I rise to announce my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

Mr. DOLPH. I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] on all questions connected with the resolutions.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Cameron,	Hale,	Miller,	Stanford,
Chace,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Teller,
Conger,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cullom,	Hoar,	Platt,
Dawes,	Logan,	Plumb,

NAYS—27.

Beck,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Berry,	Coke,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Van Wyck,
Brown,	George,	Kenna,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Walthall,
Call,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Wilson of Md.
Camden,	Gray,	Payne,

ABSENT—18.

Bowen,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Sherman,
Colquitt,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,	Vance,
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,	Vest.
Fair,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,

So the appeal was laid on the table.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend by striking out the third resolution, and on that proposition I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is merely the question of agreeing to it put in another form. It does not need any motion to amend.

Mr. BROWN. My motion rather emphasizes it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is in order. Is the call for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to strike out the third resolution, on which the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BECK. I did not hear the proposition, there is so much confusion in the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BROWN] moves to strike out the third resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair. Where a series of resolutions are proposed and there is a separate vote on each as a separate proposition, is it in order to move to strike out one? We have proceeded to take separate votes on each. The object of the Senator will be accomplished by voting against the resolution. I submit it is not a matter of striking out by motion, because the vote is on the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia has the right to have the question put in that way if he chooses. It makes a double vote, as a matter of course.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator from Georgia will withdraw his call. It is simply a consumption of time for nothing; it can not emphasize the vote in any shape, manner, or form.

Mr. BROWN. I asked for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the motion to strike out the third resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask what the pending question was before the motion of the Senator from Georgia was interposed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question would be on the adoption of the third resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. Is a motion to strike out the entire resolution to be regarded as an amendment to the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that the Senator has the right to make such a motion. It is a series of resolutions, and he moves to strike out the third resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand that a motion to strike out the third resolution would be an amendment of the series, but when a separate motion is pending to adopt one resolution, whether a motion to strike out the resolution entirely would be an amendment to the motion which could be entertained is the question which I suggest to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is clearly of opinion that the Senator has a right to make that motion. ["Vote!" "Vote!"]

The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Beck,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Payne,
Berry,	Coke,	Jackson,	Pugh,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Ransom,
Brown,	George,	Kenna,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Walthall,
Call,	Gorman,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Wilson of Md.
Camden,	Gray,	Morgan,

NAYS—31.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Cameron,	Hale,	Miller,	Stanford,
Chace,	Harrison,	Morrill,	Teller,
Conger,	Hawley,	Platt,	Van Wyck,
Cullom,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	Logan,	Sabin,

ABSENT—17.

Bowen,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,	Vest.
Dolph,	Jones of Nevada,	Riddleberger,
Fair,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Hampton,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the adoption of the third resolution. The Chair will inquire whether the yeas and nays have been ordered upon it?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not remember whether the yeas and nays have been ordered on the question of agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. COCKRELL. The question is on agreeing to the third resolution. Let us have the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. BUTLER. We want the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLPH (when his name was called). I desire to announce again that I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. If he were here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I should vote "yea" if he were present,

Mr. BLAIR (when Mr. PIKE'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. PIKE] is absent in ill health, and is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If my colleague were present, he would vote for the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. And my colleague [Mr. VEST], who is detained by sickness, would vote "nay" on the adoption of all the resolutions.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. RANSOM. My colleague [Mr. VANCE] is paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. PALMER].

Mr. BECK. I wish to announce once more the pair of the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES] with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. BOWEN]. The Senator from Florida would vote "nay," if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 30, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—30.

Aldrich,	Edmunds,	McMillan,	Sawyer,
Allison,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Sherman,
Blair,	Frye,	Manderson,	Spooner,
Cameron,	Hale,	Miller,	Stanford,
Chace,	Harrison,	Morrill,	Teller,
Conger,	Hawley,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cullom,	Hoar,	Plumb,
Dawes,	Logan,	Sabin,

NAYS—29.

Beck,	Coke,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,
Berry,	Eustis,	Kenna,	Van Wyck,
Blackburn,	George,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Brown,	Gibson,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Walthall,
Butler,	Gorman,	Morgan,	Wilson of Md.
Call,	Gray,	Payne,
Camden,	Harris,	Pugh,
Cockrell,	Jackson,	Ransom,

ABSENT—16.

Bowen,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,
Dolph,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,	Vance,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Vest.

So the third resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following as——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the fourth resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer a resolution to come in after the next resolution, at the end of the series.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama offers an amendment to the fourth resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. No, sir; it is a separate resolution, to come in at the end of the series.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question then is on the adoption of the fourth resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. If the fourth resolution is adopted would the amendment of the Senator from Alabama be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He does not offer it as an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. My resolution is a separate one.

Mr. HARRIS. He offers it as one resolution of the series, and if the last resolution is adopted I propound the question would the amendment or the additional resolution of the Senator from Alabama be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That question has not yet arisen. The Chair asked the Senator from Alabama if he proposed his resolution as an amendment to the fourth resolution, and he said that he did not. As to whether it would be in order afterward the Chair will not decide until that question arises. The question is on agreeing to the fourth resolution, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let the resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, declaring—"That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office"— ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution; and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier, whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach, and to give place to another who has not rendered such service, is a violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to this resolution, and on that question the Senator from Vermont demands the yeas and nays.

Mr. VOORHEES. I demand the yeas and nays, too.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I have had some little knowledge of the manner in which the provision of law cited in the resolution has been executed when the Republican party was in power, and I think if I had the time I could demonstrate to the satisfaction of the Senate that the Republican party has violated it ten times where the present administration has not departed from it once. Believing it to be a just, proper, and wholesome provision of law, I shall vote for the adoption of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the resolution.

The roll was called.

Mr. BROWN. I will state that I think if my colleague [Mr. COLQUITT] were present he would vote "yea" on this question, and therefore if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] desires to vote there will be no objection to his doing so.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. INGALLS. This does not seem to be a political question. Having been previously paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], I vote "yea" on the pending question.

The result was announced—yeas 56, nay 1; as follows:

YEAS—56.

Aldrich,	Chace,	Frye,	Jackson,
Allison,	Cockrell,	Gibson,	Jones of Arkansas,
Beck,	Coke,	Gorman,	Kenna,
Berry,	Conger,	Gray,	Logan,
Blackburn,	Cullom,	Hale,	McMillan,
Blair,	Dawes,	Harris,	Mahone,
Brown,	Dolph,	Harrison,	Manderson,
Butler,	Edmunds,	Hawley,	Maxey,
Camden,	Eustis,	Hoar,	Miller,
Cameron,	Evarts,	Ingalls,	Mitchell, of Oreg.
Payne,	Ransom,	Spooner,	Voorhees,
Platt,	Sabin,	Stanford,	Walthall,
Plumb,	Sawyer,	Teller,	Wilson of Iowa,
Pugh,	Sherman,	Van Wyck,	Wilson of Md.

NAYS—1.

Morgan.

ABSENT—18.

Bowen,	Hampton,	Morrill,	Sewell,
Call,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,	Vance,
Colquitt,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Vest.
Fair,	McPherson,	Riddleberger,
George,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Saulsbury,

So the fourth resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. The resolutions having been passed—I suppose they are all passed now——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolutions have been adopted.

Mr. MORGAN. I have a resolution pending, which I sent to the desk and which has not been acted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama gave notice of his desire to offer an additional resolution.

Mr. MORGAN. I offered my resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Having offered it before the resolutions were concluded, the Chair feels bound to rule that it is in order.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to raise a question of order. All the resolutions have been passed, the whole four. There is no mode of amending the series now. It is simply like dividing the vote on the passage of a bill into four parts, and when they are all passed upon you can not move to amend the bill after it has been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that in view of the notice given by the Senator from Alabama that he would offer an amendment, and the amendment having been sent to the desk, the question being raised as to whether he could or could not offer it, the resolution should be received.

Mr. HOAR. To what is it an amendment? An amendment implies a pending question to be amended. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The question, shall it pass with a certain amendment, must be acted on before it is passed. But when a series of resolutions which are four distinct propositions are before the Senate and there is a demand that the question be divided, according to the usual parliamentary law the question is put on the passage of each separately, and when each separately has passed the matter is as much beyond the reach of amendment as a bill after it has passed. Giving a notice beforehand does not change the parliamentary law. The Senator should have made his motion as an amendment to the last resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In ordinary cases clearly the Senator from Massachusetts is right; but the Senator from Alabama sent an amendment that was then in order to the Chair, and the Chair was about to put the question upon it as an amendment when the Senator from Alabama gave notice to the Senate that he would offer it as an additional resolution. The Chair thinks under the circumstances that it is clearly his right to offer the amendment.

Mr. HOAR. I hope then it will be done by unanimous consent and not as a ruling, as a matter of order, for it would embarrass the Senate, it seems to me, very much to establish such a precedent. I will ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be received.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the Senate that the Senator from Alabama may offer the resolution. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the additional resolution will be offered as an amendment. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That nothing in these resolutions contained is to be construed as declaring that the conduct of the Attorney-General renders him liable to impeachment, and the Senate disclaims the right or power to punish him by imprisonment or otherwise than by impeachment for the offense charged against him in the second resolution, which the Senate has just adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to lay that resolution on the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. INGALLS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY].

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—33.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Manderson,	Sherman,
Allison,	Frye,	Miller,	Spooner,
Blair,	Hale,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Stanford,
Cameron,	Harrison,	Morrill,	Teller,
Chace,	Hawley,	Platt,	Van Wyck,
Conger,	Hoar,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.
Cullom,	Logan,	Riddleberger,
Dawes,	McMillan,	Sabin,
Edmunds,	Mahone,	Sawyer,

NAYS—26.

Beck,	Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,
Berry,	Coke,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Eustis,	Jones of Arkansas,	Voorhees,
Brown,	George,	Kenna,	Walthall,
Butler,	Gibson,	Maxey,	Wilson of Md.
Call,	Gorman,	Morgan,
Camden,	Gray,	Payne,

ABSENT—16.

Bowen,	Hampton,	McPherson,	Saulsbury,
Colquitt,	Ingalls,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Sewell,
Dolph,	Jones of Florida,	Palmer,	Vance,
Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Pike,	Vest.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes, so that it may be the unfinished business at the next sitting of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Connecticut. [Putting the question.] The ayes have it, and the motion is agreed to.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A message from the House of Representatives has been announced. Senators will pause for a moment.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE RANKIN.

The message also conveyed to the Senate the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives commemorative of the life and services of Hon. JOSEPH RANKIN, late a Representative from the State of Wisconsin.

COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will resume their seats.

Mr. PLATT. My motion was agreed to, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut was carried.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. MITCHELL] is absent and likely to be away for a considerable time on account of sickness. He is chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and it is necessary to have an additional member appointed temporarily. I ask that the resolution which I send to the desk be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That an additional member be appointed by the President of the Senate to serve temporarily upon the Committee on Pensions.

The resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will appoint the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SAWYER] under the resolution just adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn until 12 o'clock on Monday next.

Mr. PLATT. I understand that my motion was carried.

Mr. RANSOM. No, it was not.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Has the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to take up the bill indicated by him been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I most earnestly protest against that. I was on my feet before any announcement was made for the express purpose of preventing action upon that motion, and I moved to adjourn before there was any decision of the Chair on the question. I must appeal from the decision of the Chair upon that ruling. The bill has not been made the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Missouri states the fact to be that he was seeking to prevent the adoption of the motion, that is sufficient, and the Chair will regard the order as not having been made. The question then is on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not until we settle this matter.

Mr. HOAR. If we do not, the motion can be renewed on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can be renewed, as a matter of course, like a motion to take up any other bill. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that the Senate adjourn until Monday next at 12 o'clock. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. Let us have a division. I think we can settle it by a division.

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday at 12 o'clock, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The roll having been called, the result was announced—yeas 18, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—18.

Beck,	Camden,	Gorman,	Maxey,
Berry,	Cockrell,	Gray,	Payne,
Brown,	Coke,	Harris,	Ransom.
Butler,	Eustis,	Jackson,
Call,	Gibson,	Jones of Arkansas,

NAYS—31.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Mahone,	Sabin,
Allison,	Edmunds,	Manderson,	Sawyer,
Blair,	Frye,	Miller,	Sherman,
Cameron,	Harrison,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Spooner,
Chace,	Hawley,	Morrill,	Stanford,
Conger,	Hoar,	Platt,	Teller,
Cullom,	Logan,	Plumb,	Wilson of Iowa.
Dawes,	McMillan,	Riddleberger,

ABSENT—26.

Blackburn,	Hampton,	Morgan,	Van Wyck,
Bowen,	Ingalls,	Palmer,	Vest,
Colquitt,	Jones of Florida,	Pike,	Voorhees,
Evarts,	Jones of Nevada,	Pugh,	Walthall,
Fair,	Kenna,	Saulsbury,	Wilson of Md.
George,	McPherson,	Sewell,
Hale,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Vance,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PLATT. The question recurs on my motion, I suppose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut that the bill which has been already stated, the bill for the admission of Washington, be taken up.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that when the Senate adjourn to day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do not filibuster. Let us take the question on the motion of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not propose to filibuster.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Tennessee is substantially the same as that of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HARRIS. I understood the motion of the Senator from Missouri to be that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. COCKRELL. That was my motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Until Monday next.

Mr. HARRIS. My motion is a very different one.

Mr. HARRISON. The motion of the Senator from Missouri certainly was that the Senate adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. COCKRELL. So it was.

Mr. HARRISON. Then is not that the same as the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COCKRELL. No, sir; mine was an entirely different motion.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not propose to now adjourn, but I move that when the Senate do adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is a different motion and is in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS].

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business——

Mr. PLATT. May I say——

Mr. COCKRELL. And on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH] on political questions. This seems to be taking that turn, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—3.

Brown,	Harris,	Maxey.

NAYS—28.

Aldrich,	Evarts,	Mahone,	Plumb,
Chace,	Frye,	Manderson,	Sabin,
Conger,	Harrison,	Miller,	Sawyer,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Oreg.,	Sherman,
Dawes,	Hoar,	Morrill,	Spooner,
Dolph,	Logan,	Payne,	Teller,
Edmunds,	McMillan,	Platt,	Wilson of Iowa.

ABSENT—44.

Allison,	Coke,	Jackson,	Ransom,
Beck,	Colquitt,	Jones of Arkansas,	Riddleberger,
Berry,	Eustis,	Jones of Florida,	Saulsbury,
Blackburn,	Fair,	Jones of Nevada,	Sewell,
Blair,	George,	Kenna,	Stanford,
Bowen,	Gibson,	McPherson,	Vance,
Butler,	Gorman,	Mitchell of Pa.,	Van Wyck,
Call,	Gray,	Morgan,	Vest,
Camden,	Hale,	Palmer,	Voorhees,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No quorum has voted.

Mr. PLATT. It is certainly in the power of the opposition to keep us here all night. I have no desire for such a contest, and if I may be permitted to do so I will withdraw the motion at this time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You need not withdraw it. Just move to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. Nothing is in order but a motion to adjourn or a call of the Senate.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to say, then, that I shall renew the motion on Monday immediately after the morning hour; and I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 9 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 26, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the report of the Civil Service Commission for the year ended on the 16th day of January last.

The exhibit thus made of the operations of the commission and the account thus presented of the results following the execution of the civil-service law can not fail to demonstrate its usefulness and strengthen the conviction that this scheme for a reform in the methods of administering the Government is no longer an experiment.

Wherever this reform has gained a foothold it has steadily advanced in the esteem of those charged with public administrative duties, while the people who desire good government have constantly been confirmed in their high estimate of its value and efficiency.

With the benefits it has already secured to the public service plainly apparent, and with its promise of increased usefulness easily appreciated, this cause is commended to the liberal care and jealous protection of the Congress.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, March 25, 1886.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a draught of a bill to regulate immigration and recommending its passage; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FIRE-PROOF BUILDING FOR OFFICIAL RECORDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report from the Supervising Architect recommending an appropriation to build a fire-proof building for safe-keeping of records of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

STORAGE AND TRANSPORTATION OF SILVER DOLLARS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of an appropriation to be immediately available for storage and transportation of silver dollars; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF THE TARIFF.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional correspondence relating to the revision of the tariff received since the printed volume of correspondence on that subject was transmitted to the House; which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC PARKS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the acting Chief of Engineers, with a draught of a bill to regulate the use of public parks in the District of Columbia, and recommending its passage; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

CAÑON DE PEDERNALES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report from the surveyor-general of New Mexico upon the private land claim Cañon de Pedernales; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

SUBSTITUTES IN DEPARTMENTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, in response to a resolution of the House calling for information as to the employment of substitutes in the several Departments; which was referred to the Select Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

PATRICK COLLINS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with accompanying papers, the petition of Patrick Collins, asking that his political disabilities be removed; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMISSION ON GOVERNMENT MANUSCRIPTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 1851) establishing a commission to report to Congress on manuscripts belonging to the Government; which was referred to the Joint Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House bill 6374 be taken up for present consideration.

Mr. BEACH. I shall have to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of Senate resolution No. 10, and that the same be now considered by the House.

Mr. BEACH. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded, which is equivlent to an objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the regular order is the call of standing and select committees for reports of a private nature.

ELIZABETH B. BELL.

Mr. WINANS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 5655) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Bell; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM FIELD.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 4808) granting a pension to William Field; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

SYLVESTER ROOT.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, also reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 3054) granting a pension to Sylvester Root; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. LOVERING, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back adversely bills of the following titles; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 6474) granting a pension to Frank N. Gray;
A bill (H. R. 3181) restoring a pension to Mary McCarthy;
A bill (H. R. 4037) granting a pension to Emma L. Clapp; and A bill (H. R. 5161) granting a pension to William W. Ingalls.

EDWARD GORMLEY.

On motion of Mr. LOVERING, by unanimous consent the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 5653) granting a pension to Edward Gormley, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

WILLIAM GRAY.

Mr. SPRINGER, from the Committee on Claims, reported back favorably the bill (H. R. 6411) for the relief of William Gray; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

BARKER, WILLIAMS, AND OTHERS.

On motion of Mr. GEDDES, by unanimous consent the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 6854) for the relief of Barker, Williams, and others; and the same was referred to the Committee on Claims.

GEORGE T. DUDLEY.

Mr. LYMAN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back favorably the bill (S. 498) for the relief of George T. Dudley; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of the standing and select committees.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw that motion for a moment, as I want to call up a motion to reconsider, which is pending.

Mr. WHEELER. I will withdraw it for that purpose.

MRS. E. A. BENHAM.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up a privileged motion, being the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to pass the bill of the Senate (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham.

Mr. McMILLIN. By whom was the motion to reconsider entered?

The SPEAKER. By the gentleman from Illinois on the next day after the House had rejected the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the motion to reconsider will be considered as adopted, for the purpose of allowing gentlemen who favor or oppose this bill to make an explanation of the vote which shall be given upon it at this time. I desire that privilege myself, and other gentlemen most probably want an opportunity of explaining their votes. I therefore ask that the motion be considered as agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. By unanimous consent that can be done.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is there to be an effort to pass the bill now?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly; that is the object of the motion.

Mr. McMILLIN. I shall object then to allowing the motion to be adopted by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules of the House a motion to reconsider a vote taken under the operation of the previous question is not debatable; but if the motion to reconsider is carried, then the bill is debatable, being divested of the operation of the previous question.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks unanimous consent that the motion to reconsider be regarded as agreed to, so that debate may be had upon the bill.

Mr. McMILLIN. I object to the reconsideration. I think this bill has been properly decided and disposed of by the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the bill.

Mr. BUCK. Is it not in order to make a statement of the reasons for asking this reconsideration?

The SPEAKER. Not if objection is made, and objection has been made to the request of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] objects. The question is, Will the House reconsider the vote?

The House proceeded to divide on the question.

Mr. McMILLIN. For the purpose of allowing debate, I shall withdraw the objection and consent that the motion to reconsider be regarded as adopted.

The SPEAKER. The question now is, Shall the bill pass? which question is debatable.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. E. A. Benham, wife of the late General Henry W. Benham, at the rate of $50 per month.

Mr. SPRINGER. As a part of my remarks, I ask that the report of the committee be read. I do this, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of having the House understand clearly what this case is. It has never been considered in the House except at Friday night sessions, when very few members were present. I hope the House will therefore give attention to the reading of the report, as there may be another yea-and-nay vote, and as there has not been a discussion of the question in a full House.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. HUTTON) is as follows:

That Mrs. E. A. Benham is the widow of Bvt. Maj. Gen. Henry W. Benham. He was graduated from the Military Academy and promoted to the grade of brevet second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers July 1, 1837, and died June 1, 1884, having served his country faithfully and well as engineer and soldier for a period of nearly thirty years.

As a testimonial of his patriotism, fidelity, and courage, and his personal and official worth, the order of Brigadier-General Newton is made a part of this report.

Both as an engineer and as a soldier General Benham made a record of which any man might feel proud. During a period of thirty years of the most efficient and faithful service he was the recipient of the highest commendations from Generals Taylor, Wool, Scott, Totten, McClellan, Sherman, Hooker, Meade, and Grant, with a record rarely equaled, perhaps never surpassed, by one of his rank.

Your committee report the bill favorably and recommend its passage.

[General Orders, No. 9.]

HEADQUARTERS CORPS OF ENGINEERS,
UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., June 5, 1884.

It becomes the painful duty of the brigadier-general commanding to announce to the Corps of Engineers the death of a brother officer.

Col. Henry W. Benham, Corps of Engineers (retired), brevet major-general, United States Army, died in New York city on the evening of June 1, 1884.

General Benham was graduated from the Military Academy and promoted to the grade of brevet second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers July 1, 1837.

He served as assistant-engineer upon the improvement of Savannah River, Georgia, 1837–'38; as superintending engineer of the repairs of Fort Marion and of Saint Augustine sea-wall, Florida, 1839–'44, of the repairs of defenses of Annapolis, Md., 1844–'45, of repairs of Fort Mifflin, Pennsylvania, and Fort McHenry, Maryland, 1845, and of repairs of Forts Madison and Washington, Maryland, 1846–'47; in the war with Mexico, 1847–'48, being engaged in the battle of Buena Vista, February 22, 23, 1847, where he was wounded; as assistant engineer in the repairs of the defenses of New York Harbor, 1848–'49; as superintending engineer of the construction of the sea-wall for the protection of Great Brewster Island, Boston Harbor, 1849–'52, of the construction of Buffalo light-house, New York, 1852, and of the Washington navy-yard, 1852–'53.

He was on duty as assistant in charge of the United States Coast Survey Office, Washington, D. C., and in Europe in connection therewith, from March, 1853, until November, 1856; as superintending engineer of the construction of Forts Winthrop and Independence, Boston Harbor, Massachusetts, 1856–'57, of the survey of site for fort on Clark's Point, New Bedford, Mass., and repair of Fort Adams, Newport Harbor, Rhode Island, 1857–'58, of the construction of the fort at Sandy Hook, 1858–'61, of the Potomac Aqueduct, 1860, and as engineer of the quarantine commissioners of New York Harbor, 1859–'60.

He served during the war of the rebellion, 1861–'66, as chief engineer Department of the Ohio, May–July, 1861, being engaged upon the staff of Brig. Gen. T. A. Morris, in military operations in Western Virginia, at Laurel Hill, July 6–11; in command of the troops engaged in the combat of Garrick's Ford, July 13, 1861, and as acting inspector-general, Department of the Ohio, August 5–16.

Promoted to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers August 13, 1861, he took part in the campaign in West Virginia, August–November, 1861, being in command of a brigade at New Creek, August 16, 1861; in action at Carnifex Ferry, September 10, 1861, and the pursuit of the enemy from Cotton Hill to Raleigh County, Virginia, November 12–16, 1861. He was in command of the northern district of the Department of the South March to June, 1862, being present at Tybee Island, Georgia, during the bombardment and capture of Fort Pulaski April 10, 11, 1862, and engaged, in command, at the attack on Secessionville, James Island, S. C., June 16, 1862. From September, 1862, to February 28, 1863, he was on duty as superintending engineer of the construction of the fortifications at Portsmouth Harbor, New Hampshire. Assigned to the command of the engineer brigade, Army of the Potomac, he was engaged in superintending the construction of ponton bridges across the Rappahannock for the passage of the army at Chancellorsville, April 29–May 5, 1863; at Franklin's Crossing, in the face of the enemy, June 5, 1863, and over the Potomac, at Edwards Ferry, June 21, 1863. From July, 1863, to May, 1864, he was in charge of the ponton depot at Washington, D. C.

From June, 1864, to June, 1865, he was in command of the engineer brigade, Army of the Potomac, being engaged in superintending the construction of a ponton bridge 2,200 feet long across the James River, at Fort Powhatan, June 15, 1864; in the construction and command of the defenses of City Point, Va., October 1864, to April 2, 1865; in holding the captured lines at Petersburg, April 2, 1865; in repairing bridges across the Appomattox and Staunton Rivers, April 3–23, 1865, and on march to Washington, D. C., May–June, 1865. Since the close of the war General Benham served as superintending engineer of the construction of Fort Winthrop and Fort Independence, Massachusetts, from 1865 to 1882; of Fort Warren, Massachusetts, from 1867 to 1882; of works on Long Island Head from 1869 to 1882; of the defenses of Provincetown, Mass., from 1866 to 1870, and from 1872 to 1877; of the construction of Boston Harbor sea-walls from May, 1866, to April, 1873, and of Fort Montgomery, New York, and the inner defenses of New York Harbor, the forts at New York Narrows, and of Sandy Hook, New York, from July, 1877, until June 30, 1882, when he was retired from active service by the operation of law.

General Benham was promoted successively from the grade of lieutenant to that of colonel of engineers and brigadier-general of volunteers, having declined the appointment of major in the Ninth Infantry, tendered him in March, 1855.

He received the brevets of captain, United States Army, "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista," February 23, 1847; colonel, United States Army, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Garrick's Ford, Va," July 13, 1861; brigadier-general, United States Army, for "gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating with the surrender of the insurgent army under General Robert E. Lee," March 13, 1865; major-general, United States Army, for "gallant and meritorious services during the war," March 13, 1865, and major-general of volunteers, "for gallant and meritorious services during the war," March 13, 1865.

The record of General Benham's services and his zeal in the discharge of his duties form the best tribute to his memory.

As a testimonial of respect for the memory of the desceased, the officers of the Corps of Engineers will wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days.

By command of Brigadier-General Newton:

JOHN M. WILSON,
Major of Engineers, Brevet Colonel U. S. A.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire that the time occupied in the debate on this bill shall be equally divided between those in favor of the bill and those opposed to it. The gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON], desires to speak in opposition to the bill, and after I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BUCK] ten minutes I will yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, and I think that after thirty minutes' debate the previous question might be moved.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois will not undertake to control the time in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. I shall yield the time in opposition, as I have said, to the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. But those in opposition to the bill ought to control that time. Are you in favor of the bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I am.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Then you might control the time in support of the bill, but let those who are opposed to the bill control their own time.

Mr. SPRINGER. It has been usual to grant this courtesy to the chairman of the committee reporting the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. He did not report this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I understand that.

The SPEAKER. And has of course the privilege of yielding any portion of the hour that he desires during that time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire in all fairness to announce that at the end of thirty minutes' time we ought to have a vote; and the time will be divided as I have indicated.

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I think if this House fully understood the facts upon which the passage of this bill depends it would be very willing to correct what I consider an injustice done by the House a few days ago in rejecting this bill.

The real rank of Henry W. Benham was that of brigadier-general of volunteers, and it was conferred upon him March 13, 1865. He graduated at West Point in 1837, and served his country in a military capacity for 45 years. He was wounded at the battle of Buena Vista, and was brevetted captain for gallant and meritorious services on that field. He was brevetted a colonel of the United States Army for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Carrick's Ford in Virginia, July 13, 1861, and was appointed a brigadier-general of volunteers for gallant and meritorious services during the war which closed in 1865, the order specifying that it was for gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating with the surrender of General Robert E. Lee. Congress has in several instances bestowed pensions of $50 per month on the widows of general officers holding the rank which General Benham held.

I have examined the law in reference to these precedents, and I find that the last Congress passed similar acts for the benefit of the widow of Brigadier-General Crane, for the widow of Brigadier-General Barnes, Brigadier-General Mower, the widow of Admiral Beaumont, the widow of Maj. Gen. E. O. C. Ord, the widow of Rear-Admiral Edward Middleton, of Rear-Admiral Cornelius Stribling, and the widow of Maj. Gen. Francis P. Blair.

I understand that since 1882 38 cases have occurred where Congress has granted a pension of $50 a month to the widows of general officers both in the Army and in the Navy. So that we are not without precedents; and I think that this House ought not now to make an exception in the case of this gallant and illustrious soldier.

General Benham lost his life by reason of disease contracted in the line of duty. A point has been made in reference to the evidence; but fortunately the evidence has been all set forth in the report which is presented, and which is now before the House. I will only allude to the affidavit of Stephen M. Chester. He says:

General Benham suffered severely with rheumatism and was treated therefor by the surgeons of the neighboring hospital camp.

I do most distinctly recollect that he did have such attacks during the period mentioned, and no doubt exists in my mind that the disease to which he ultimately succumbed grew out of the exposure which he then subjected himself to in his ardent zeal and strict sense of duty.

There are other affidavits of similar purport.

A MEMBER. How old is the widow?

Mr. BUCK. I think she is about sixty-five years of age.

Mr. STEELE. She is sixty-seven years of age.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from Connecticut allow me?

Mr. BUCK. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will say this House at this session granted a similar pension to the widow of Brigadier-General Crocker, of Iowa, who was also brevet major-general; so that this House in this Congress is on record on precisely a similar bill.

Mr. BUCK. I am very glad the gentleman from Iowa has interrupted me to call my attention to a fact I had forgotten. Not only has this Congress established a precedent, but the last Congress established precedent after precedent of the same nature, and the Forty-seventh Congress, I believe, did the same. So that it might be said we have established this precedent over and over again. And it seems to me a little severe, a little hard to pick out and make an exception of such a man as this, whose illustrious services are known to every one who reads the history of his country—the hero, the illustrious hero of two wars, in which he served with distinction and to the credit of himself and the benefit of his country. It seems to me it is not unjust or unwise for this House to correct the vote which it gave the other day in refusing to place the widow of General Benham on the pension-list.

Mr. SOWDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BUCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. SOWDEN. Is this widow of Brigadier-General Benham now borne on the pension-rolls; and, if so, for what amount?

Mr. BUCK. I was just about to make this explanation. General Benham died in 1882. His widow has never applied for any pension at all, and she is therefore not borne on the pension-rolls of the United States. If she had applied and the pension had been granted, she would have been entitled to $30 per month.

Mr. KLEINER. Will the gentleman please state why the claimant in this case did not apply for a pension at the Pension Office?

Mr. BUCK. I am unable to state why she did not. She could have done so with every prospect of success.

Mr. KLEINER. Was it because the pension that would have been granted there was not large enough?

Mr. BUCK. Perhaps that was the reason. I can not tell what motive this lady had in not applying. If she had applied, the evidence set forth in this printed report is ample to have justified the Commissioner of Pensions in putting her on the pension-roll, but of course only to give her $30 a month, as the law provides in such cases.

Mr. BRADY. Will the gentleman permit me to say that he is mistaken as to the time of General Benham's death. He died in 1884, not in 1882.

Mr. KELLEY. That is correct. General Benham died in 1884. And I will state in this connection that the widow, aged, infirm, and poor, is the daughter of an officer of the war of 1812, who was pensioned on account of the severe wounds he received in that war.

Mr. BUCK. From the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I infer that the patriotic military spirit exists in that family on both sides.

In view of the long and faithful services of General Benham, and in view of the many precedents for the passage of this bill, I think it would be a most gracious and appropriate act to place Mrs. Benham on our pension-roll.

Mr. MATSON. This bill was voted upon on Monday last, and a yea-and-nay vote was taken on its passage. The result was 92 yeas and 100 nays. The motion to reconsider was allowed by unanimous consent, so that the bill comes again before Congress on the question of its passage.

The report in this connection has been read. And I think after it has been listened to no one will say that there is anything extraordinary in this case that shows that this widow is entitled to extraordinary favor from the Government of the United States. The bill proposes that Congress shall give her an original pension of $50 per month. She has no pension at all now, because of the death of her husband. She has never applied to the Pension Office for a pension. But she proposes that this Congress shall at the very beginning give her a pension of $50 a month, on account, I suppose, of the services of her husband, not on account of any allegation that his death was the result of his military service.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would be very glad if this House would establish a precedent upon this subject. The matter was mooted and discussed considerably on Monday last. But there was action one way by a majority of one vote in one case and action in another way in perhaps two or three other cases by a little larger vote. So that it still remains a question as to what is the sense of this House in relation to giving $50 a month to widows of general officers in the Army and officers of corresponding rank in the Navy.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that this bill presents to this House a fair case for making a test. There is nothing in the case for which the friends of this widow can claim extraordinary merit, or can say that she ought to be singled out from among the widows of the country and given a much larger pension than the law allows. So if I state the proposition correctly, I ask gentlemen to consider that when they vote to-day in favor of the passage of this bill it amounts to voting in favor of giving $50 a month to the widows of all general officers.

Mr. HOLMAN. Without reference to disability.

Mr. MATSON. Yes; without reference to the question of disability, and without reference to the cause of death. That, as I conceive, Mr. Speaker, is the proposition presented to the House upon which it is to vote. I believe that this kind of legislation is vicious; I believe that it tends to build up an aristocracy; I believe that the pensions of this country, as to rates, at least, ought to be governed by general laws. I do not say that there are not many meritorious cases where Congress ought to intervene and grant a pension, but as to giving pensions for rank, that question ought to be governed entirely by general laws, and one officer, or the widow of one officer, ought not to be selected and given one pension while the widows of other officers of corresponding rank are allowed only the pension fixed by law. I repeat that there is nothing in this case which in my judgment makes it an extraordinary one.

I do not say that the service of every other general officer was just as great, but I do say that there was nothing extraordinary in this case. That this is a record of honorable service no one will deny; that it is a record of long service no one will deny, but that there is in it anything extraordinary, anything calling for the intervention of Congress to single out this woman from a large number of widows of officers of corresponding rank and give her a pension so much larger than they receive, no one who has examined the case will contend.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON].

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. How much time am I to have, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ten minutes.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, no gentleman upon this floor can discuss this question properly in ten minutes, but I will make my statement as brief as I can. There is a principle underlying this question of granting special pensions which this House ought to consider well before voting. The gentleman from Connecticut who has preceded me [Mr. BUCK] said that we had thirty-eight precedents for legislation of the kind proposed in this bill, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] came to the rescue and added another, a bill passed by the present House, making the number thirty-nine.

I want the House to understand that the pension to the widow of General Crocker was passed at a night session, when there were not more than forty members present, and was passed upon the earnest appeal of the gentleman from Iowa, when there were some of us standing here protesting that it was wrong in principle. We knew it was wrong, but the only way to defeat it was to call for a quorum, and that would defeat at the same time the claims of private soldiers who were seeking to get upon the pension-roll.

And now, having passed a bill under these circumstances, they come back and ring it in upon us as a precedent, when it was only passed by forty members of the House, and then only upon the plea that if a quorum was demanded it would result in killing the pension bill of some deserving private soldier.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes; but I do not want it to come out of my time.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am not aware that there was any advantage of any character taken that night.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. There was not, because you begged us not to do it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I simply want to add, that it was stated here in that same debate that there had never been an instance of the kind where a pension had been refused to the widow of a general officer, and that statement was uncontradicted.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if I have only ten minutes, I would like to at least control my own time. Now, I say that action should not be taken as a precedent for this case. All over this land we have private soldiers appealing to Congress for some kind of relief, for some kind of legislation whereby they may be relieved from the operation of the unjust and harsh rules prescribed by the Pension Bureau, by which they are compelled to prove that they were sound men when they entered the service.

All over this broad land, I say, there are men who are unable to make the proof required by the Pension Office, and who are in the almshouses and the poor-houses of the country, and when they ask Congress for relief, their appeals are met by the argument that you can not pension them, because it would make too great a drain upon the Treasury. The men who carried your flag from the Ohio to the sea and back to this capital when they ask to be pensioned are answered by the argument that to grant their demands would bankrupt the national Treasury. You say that you can not afford to pension the men who carried the musket and the knapsack for three years because it would pile up a debt that this nation could not pay. Yet this Congress sits here day after day, runs its hands down into the vaults of the Treasury and pulls out $50 a month for the widow of one man, $50 a month for the widow of another man, $2,000 a year for the widow of another, and so on.

Mr. BRADY. I would like to ask the gentleman why he voted to give the $2,000?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I voted for the pension to Mrs. Hancock simply because a similar pension had been granted to the widow of General Thomas, who was a Republican; and when you came here and asked——

Mr. BRADY. Is not that a precedent?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Wait a moment; I will answer your question. When you came here and asked us to give the same amount of pension to the widow of General Hancock, while I believed it to be wrong, yet, as Hancock had been the standard-bearer of the Democratic party, if we had voted against the proposition it would have been said that our opposition was based on political grounds. That is the reason I voted for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRADY. I understand the gentleman to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MCMILLIN). Does the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, I do not. I say that in this class of legislation you can not justify yourselves before the people. Though I may have voted inconsistently, it does not settle a great principle. Because I may have been wrong, it is no excuse for any other man to do the same; and I will advise the gentleman from Virginia that, if he expects to keep himself right with his constituents, he had better not follow me too closely. [Laughter.]

Mr. PETTIBONE. I agree to that.

Mr. GALLINGER. The gentleman admits that he was wrong once. I ask him whether, to be consistent, he is not wrong again.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I knew I was wrong then. [Laughter.] I knew I was wrong when I cast the vote; and I told my colleagues that I did not indorse the principle, but cast the vote for the reason I have given here—not because I indorsed the principle upon which the proposition was based.

Now, I say, gentlemen can not justify themselves before the soldiers of the country in this class of legislation. If they think that the rank and file of the soldiers of this country indorse legislation of this kind they are mistaken.

Mr. GALLINGER. We will take our chances on that.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. You may try your chances. But men in this Congress who have had the nerve to stand up and oppose this class of legislation have their tables piled with private letters from soldiers in all parts of the country indorsing their course and votes on these questions. I could point out members here who have stacks upon stacks of letters from humble private soldiers indorsing their course in refusing to single out the widow of one man and put her in a position to live in comfort and ease, while the widow of another man who carried the knapsack and musket for three or four years must go to the poor-house to live and die a pauper, simply because she is unable to prove that the disease from which her husband died was contracted in his service in the Army. If she can not prove that, she has no remedy whatever.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the voting of this pension deprive that woman of the opportunity of proving those facts?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. No, sir; but why not put her on the pension-roll by an act of Congress?

Mr. BOUTELLE. Bring her case in, and we will vote for it.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. We are talking now about general principles. It is easy enough for gentlemen to say they will vote for such a bill; but you must first get a report from the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the gentleman admits that he has not any principle in his votes.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I do not admit that. I say I have a principle in my votes. I admit that I voted against one bill contrary to my views of right; but I do not intend to vote for another.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, fifteen minutes have been occupied in opposition to this bill and ten minutes in favor of it. I will only occupy the floor five minutes, and then call the previous question. I make this announcement now, because I do not wish to be guilty of any seeming discourtesy in moving the previous question at the conclusion of my remarks.

I voted in opposition to this bill when the question was taken by yeas and nays on Monday last. I did so under the belief that the claimant was now receiving $30 a month under the general law.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. As a matter of fact, is she not getting $20 a month?

Several MEMBERS. No, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state what the fact is. She is getting nothing on account of her husband's services, but is receiving $20 a month on account of the services of her father. But if this bill should pass, she will get $50 a month in lieu of all other pension allowances to which she might be entitled.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Illinois whether she is not now on the pension-roll by a special act of Congress as the daughter of General McNeill, and drawing a pension at the rate of $20?

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman will not take up my time in reiterating what I have said myself.

Mr. McMILLIN. I hope my friend from Illinois will allow me to ask a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I am to answer all these questions before I can proceed with my statement I may have to withdraw what I have said in regard to the time I should occupy.

Mr. McMILLIN. There is one fact not developed thus far in this discussion, which I think should be brought out. Is it not a fact that the reason this lady is not drawing a pension on account of the services of her deceased husband is that he was on the retired-list, and that widows of this class of officers are not permitted to draw pensions under the general law? That is the reason we ought not to grant this pension. We ought not to take care of the husband during his life and then of all those who come after him for all time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let my time begin now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not subject to interruption except by his own consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a statement that if I am to answer questions every moment of course I will not be able to do so.

Mr. HAMMOND. The gentleman's time is under his own control, and let him proceed without interruption.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, it is true when this officer died he was on the retired-list, but it is also true he was on the active-list for forty-five years. He was in the Mexican war, and his record of service is as brilliant as that of any man whose widow we have placed upon the statute-book as entitled to a pension.

Let me call the attention of the House to what is said by General Wilson in the report which has been already read by the Clerk:

General Benham was promoted successively from the grade of lieutenant to that of colonel of engineers and brigadier-general of volunteers, having declined the appointment of major in the Ninth Infantry, tendered him in March, 1885.

He received the brevets of captain, United States Army, "for gallant and meritorious conduct in the battle of Buena Vista," February 23, 1847; colonel, United States Army, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Carrick's Ford, Va.," July 13, 1861; brigadier-general, United States Army, for "gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating with the surrender of the insurgent army under General Robert E. Lee," March 13, 1865; major-general, United States Army, for "gallant and meritorious services during the war," March 13, 1865, and major-general of volunteers, "for gallant and meritorious services during the war," March 13, 1865.

This officer has been a worker in the service for forty-five years. He has performed gallant and meritorious service on many fields. He has also discharged the more arduous service of building ponton bridges over which our Army has crossed in the face and under the hottest fire of the enemy. He has given a long and laborious life to the service of his country. His widow is now over sixty-six years of age and in the course of nature will remain but a few years longer with us. She is in destitute circumstances, and while she is justly entitled to this recognition on the part of the Government, she also needs this aid to smooth and console her declining years. Congress ought in my judgment to make an exception of this case by placing her name on the pension-roll in accordance with the provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. McCOMAS. Will the gentleman from Illinois consent to an amendment making the pension $30 a month instead of $50 a month? If he will do so I will vote for the proposition.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can not consent to any such amendment. Besides, the bill is not subject to amendment on its final passage.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] said if this bill were to pass it would be a precedent for giving the widows of all general officers a pension of $50 a month. It would no more be a precedent for giving a pension of $50 to the widows of general officers than the proposition which was promptly made in this House at the beginning of this session by that gentleman to give the widow of General Grant a pension of $5,000 a year, and which is now the law, would be a precedent for giving to the widow of every general officer the like amount of pension of $5,000 a year. It was, Mr. Speaker, a recognition, a proper and generous recognition on the part of this great Republic of the services of her distinguished husband. And I invoke for the widow of this faithful officer who performed forty-five years of active service the same recognition, although in a more limited degree and for a pension of a much smaller amount.

This is all I have to say. I hope the House will pass the bill.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it not a fact that the operation of this bill would add only $30 a month to her pension?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly, she is now, as I said before, receiving a pension of $20 a month on account of the services rendered to the country by her father, but nothing on account of the services of her husband. The passage of this act, therefore, is merely adding $30 a month to her pension in recognition of the services of her husband—making $50 in all.

I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. MATSON demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 117, nays 85, not voting 121; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following pairs were announced from the Clerk's desk until further notice:

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. LEHLBACH.
Mr. FORAN with Mr. THOMPSON.
Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.
Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, with Mr. STEPHENSON.
Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. NEGLEY.
Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana.
Mr. HALE with Mr. WARNER, of Missouri.
Mr. SKINNER with Mr. MORRILL.
Mr. ST. MARTIN with Mr. HOUK.
Mr. IRION with Mr. STRUBLE.
Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. MILLIKEN.
Mr. BENNETT with Mr. McKENNA.
Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. LOUTTIT.
Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. VAN SCHAICK, until March 30.
For this day:
Mr. TARSNEY with Mr. IKE H. TAYLOR.
Mr. ROBERTSON with Mr. LITTLE.
Mr. RANDALL with Mr. MCMILLIN. If present, Mr. RANDALL would vote "ay" and Mr. MCMILLIN "no."
Mr. MCMILLIN. I voted on the roll-call, but I find I am paired with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]. I understand he is unable to be here, and therefore I withdraw my vote.
Mr. CRAIN with Mr. SESSIONS.
Mr. MILLS with Mr. MCKINLEY.
Mr. WELLBORN with Mr. HITT.
Mr. CULBERSON with Mr. ATKINSON.
Mr. HERBERT with Mr. GOFF.
Mr. MULLER with Mr. GUENTHER.
Mr. MCADOO with Mr. GILFILLAN.
Mr. DORSEY with Mr. SNYDER.
Mr. DORSEY. I am paired only on political questions with Mr. SNYDER for the day.
Mr. COX with Mr. DUNHAM.
Mr. DOWDNEY with Mr. JAMES.
Mr. JAMES. I am only paired with Mr. DOWDNEY until Saturday on all political questions.
The vote was then announced as above recorded.
Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.
The latter motion was agreed to.

COL. HENRY J. HUNT.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the Private Calendar.
Mr. WHEELER. I move an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, that when the House resumes the consideration of the bill pending in the Committee of the Whole that the debate be limited to an hour and a half.
Mr. SPRINGER. That is not an amendment; it is an independent motion.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to go into the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, and pending that that debate on the bill pending in the committee be limited to an hour and a half.
Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] has the floor, and I desire before the question is put to know how much time remains to him?
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska has fifty minutes remaining.
Mr. SPRINGER. I do not think it is fair to limit the debate to an hour and a half, because there will be no opportunity by that arrangement to give an equal division to the other side. I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who is not now in his seat, desires to be heard. If the gentleman will agree that the debate shall go on I have no doubt it will be brought to a close at the proper time.
Mr. WHEELER. I made the suggestion at the request of the chairman of the committee, but I will not further insist upon it.
The SPEAKER. Is the motion withdrawn?
Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw it.
Mr. SPRINGER'S motion was then agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. 37) to change the rank of an officer on the retired-list of the Army; on which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] has the floor, and has still fifty minutes of his time remaining.
Mr. LAIRD. Mr. Chairman, it is not my desire to take up the time of the committee except for the few moments necessary to complete the remarks commenced on Friday last. When interrupted on last private bill day by the House passing from the Committee of the Whole for the consideration of this bill, I was about to discuss the objection which was urged to the passage of the act by several gentlemen who had participated in the debate, and whose objections were predicated upon the fact of the character of the legislation proposed.
It is to be admitted that the bill under consideration is a private bill, and is intended to make amends for an injustice suffered under a misconstruction of a general law. That construction comes about in this manner: Formerly a division of artillery was composed of a train of artillery of six guns together with all of their appurtenances, and a company of cannoneers larger than a company of infantry, together with a company of drivers—mounted, equipped, uniformed, and paid differently from the company of cannoneers.
That is to say, then a train of artillery was composed of two companies, one a foot company and one mounted, called "drivers." In all modern armies this "division" of artillery is the equivalent of the squadron of cavalry or of the battalion of infantry, and is composed of one body of troops, including both gunners and drivers, which took the name of "battery." But the War Office absurdly held to the contrary—contrary to the usages of all armies of the civilized world, including our own country, that the battery was the equivalent, simply, of a company of infantry or troop of cavalry. Hence the artillery of the Army of the Potomac, consisting of sixty batteries of three hundred and sixty guns, was considered as the equivalent of only a brigade of infantry, and consequently, under the law which prescribed a brigadier-general for each brigade of from four to six regiments, but one brigadier-general could be given to the whole artillery arm of the service.
All the armies of the United States, aggregating at one time upward of two millions of men, on this basis could not have furnished artillery enough to warrant the appointment of a major-general of artillery. Hence the artillery officers, by a strained and unnatural construction of the law, were deprived of promotion. This is an anomaly which bore hard on that arm of the service, and justice can only be done by a special law to correct the evils in any given case.
It has been proposed, Mr. Chairman, to correct such evils by a general law; that is, to pass a general law, providing that officers shall be retired on one grade higher than their rank on the active-list, providing they held that higher grade in the volunteer service during the war. This seems to be fair; but what would be its practical working?
When the volunteer armies were raised it was provided that there should be appointed one brigadier-general for each brigade of from four to six regiments, not less than four and not to exceed six; and one major-general for each division, to be composed of not less than twelve regiments, or three brigades. This method, while not fixing an absolute number of such officers, limited the total number by the number of brigades or divisions in the service at any one given time.
When this law was passed many brigadier-generals were appointed, some to be chiefs of staff, some to be adjutant-generals, some chief quartermasters and commissaries, some provost-marshals-general and for other service, for whom no such rank had been provided in the law. Some who were sent into the field in command of troops proved to be incompetent and were shelved; but the same influences that had enabled them to obtain commissions enabled them also to retain their rank after their retirement from the field. As to the major-generals, there were a number of appointments of the same kind, one of the first being General Hitchcock, who declined as being incapacitated for field service, but was again appointed with the understanding that he was not required for field service, but for his valuable experience and counsel. He consequently accepted the appointment and became a counselor to the war office and general-utility man. Another appointment was given to the governor of a State, Governor Morgan, of New York, and certainly he never was expected to exercise that command in the field; and another one was appointed to a local command.
Now, for each of these officers of staff, administrative, and shelved as incompetent, thus receiving commissions as general officers, some officers of junior rank had to go into the field and perform the duties properly belonging to these gentlemen, without the rank or the pay belonging to the duties which they performed, so that divisions were often commanded by brigadier-generals and brigades by colonels.
Now, under the proposed general law "to reward service" all the service of these officers is to be pooled, unless you follow the policy of meting out justice to them by means of special bills, and the rewards to be distributed not to the men who did the service, who exercised the commands, who bore the responsibilities as well as the expense, but the "divvy" is to go to the men who held the rank, while the men who did the service are to be deprived of all benefit because of their want of it (i. e., rank). They are not provided for by the general law.
There is but one just and proper way to meet the evils that are manifest in this, and that is by taking up each case on its own merits and doing justice according to the facts, and it would be a strange thing, Mr. Chairman, if this Congress should prove itself unable to discriminate between the cases which have merit and those which have no merit. True, it can be done only by special legislation, for special legislation only can provide for anomalous cases. General Hunt, with the rank of colonel and brigadier-general, exercised for nearly four years the command of a major-general of the Army of the United States, and he is, so far as can be ascertained, the only officer in the armies of the United States in that great war who exercised a permanent corps command without receiving the rank and pay of a major-general.
Now, Mr. Chairman, without in any way interfering with the organization of the Army, he can receive the benefits of that rank. And is there any man upon the floor of this House, particularly upon this side of it, who will deny that General Hunt is entitled to that rank and that reward, so far as it is in our power to confer it? It is not becoming to the justice or the honor of a great and wealthy nation to exact or accept such services from him at his own cost and the impoverishment of his family.
If he should now be retired with the rank and pay of a major-general from the date of his retirement to the day of his death, as indicated by the mortality tables, the increase of pay, if profitably invested, would not make good to him the extra expenses and their accumulations; it would require the full pay of a major-general for the balance of his life to make full restitution to his family of the fund which was taken from them by him in order that he might maintain himself in the field as a major-general while only holding the rank and drawing the pay of a brigadier-general. He does not need this extra pay to live on, but he does need it to die on and to make good the losses of fortune which his family sustained by reason of the expenses imposed on him while exercising a command as a major-general and bearing its expenses without its pay.

The objection, Mr. Chairman, of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] to the bill now under consideration, as I understood it, goes, not to this particular measure or to General Hunt, who is the object of it, but to this bill as a precedent, on the theory that it is the good case which makes the bad precedent. Not that there is no merit in this case, but that there is danger in it as a precedent for cases in which there will be no merit except that of the precedent itself.

Let us see. General Hunt has been forty-eight years in the active service, and through two wars he was especially mentioned for distinguished services in nearly every battle in which he was engaged from the beginning of the war with Mexico to the close of the war for the preservation of the Union. He won every grade from lieutenant of artillery to major-general of the armies of the United States by brevet before he got it actually for gallant and meritorious services on the battlefields. He subordinated himself to the good of his country, and remained, not from choice but from motives of patriotism, at the head of the artillery, thus sacrificing personal fame, rank, and honor, as well as pay to a great cause.

I submit here a letter of General McClellan to Colonel Lyman, of the Forty-eighth Congress, in which he sets out the reasons why General Hunt was not promoted according to merit:

32 WASHINGTON SQUARE, NEW YORK, May 27, 1884.

MY DEAR COLONEL LYMAN: I have just read the debate upon the bill to place Col. H. J. Hunt on the retired-list as a major-general. I assigned Colonel (then Major) Hunt to the command of the artillery reserve of the Army of the Potomac soon after its organization. He held that command until the arrival of the army on the James River at the close of "the seven days," when, upon General Barry being relieved from duty, I appointed Hunt to the position of chief of artillery. Hunt was more than once applied for by other generals to be assigned to them as commander of a brigade of infantry, but my appreciation of the value of his services in the artillery was such that I steadfastly resisted all such applications.

His experience with field artillery in Mexico, his intimate knowledge of the theory and practice of artillery, his successful labors in improving the tactics of that arm, his remarkable administrative ability, his extraordinary power of handling masses of artillery in battle—in brief, his peculiar and entire fitness for the position of chief of artillery of a large army in the field—rendered it my duty to call upon him to sacrifice his chances of promotion and his individual interests for the good of the country and the efficiency of the army under my command. Most cheerfully and without a murmur Hunt acceded to my demand.

I did my best—but in vain—to obtain for him rank and promotion in his own arm, and never permitted myself to doubt that in the end he would receive the just reward of his services and sacrifices. In the armies of the great military powers his command would have been regarded as the equivalent of an army corps, and he would have received the corresponding rank and reward. If Hunt had been permitted to take command of a brigade of infantry, he would long before the close of the war have been in command of an army corps at least.

In view of the fact that he sacrificed his chance of promotion to his sense of duty to his own arm of the service and in deference to the urgent wishes of at least one of the commanders of the Army of the Potomac, I think that the bill in question should be regarded as a simple act of justice, and not as a special favor to him. I admit that such bills should be closely scrutinized and passed only in extraordinary cases, but this is an extraordinary and exceptional case, in fact I know of none other just like it, and the more carefully it is examined the more clear will it be that it is a proper case for extraordinary action on the part of Congress.

Let me say one thing more—the position of chief of artillery was not a grade, nor was it a definite position or rank in that arm; it was simply a matter of detail or assignment, carrying with it vastly increased responsibilities and duties, without any corresponding pay or privileges.

With the earnest hope that this measure of justice may be meted out to one who served his country so long, so gallantly, and so ably, and that this debt of gratitude so long due may now be paid,

I am, sincerely, your friend,

GEO. B. McCLELLAN.

Col. THEODORE LYMAN,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

General Hunt held the command of major-general, in fact, from the beginning of the war to the end of it. He twice won the rank to which this bill seeks to elevate him by meritorious services, as is evidenced by the two commissions which are respectfully submitted in evidence to the House.

I hold in my hand the two brevet commissions to General Henry J. Hunt, in one of which it is mentioned he is promoted by brevet for gallant and meritorious conduct on the field of battle at Gettysburg; this is a brevet of major-general in the volunteer service of the United States. The other is for general meritorious service during the conduct of the war, by which he is brevetted to a major-generalship in the regular Army of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine declaims against this kind of legislation. He is well advised in the history of his own and that of other countries. Will he cite to the House another case that can arise from the war of the rebellion? Will he cite to the House one case from the war of the Revolution down that can in any wise parallel the facts presented in Hunt's case? Is there an instance from the time of Cæsar to that of Grant that will furnish a parallel to the case of General Hunt?

Gentlemen profess to fear a precedent. There is one quality about this case which distinguishes it from all others that have fallen under my observation, and that is the modesty of the man under consideration. He was content to believe that he could serve his country better in a subordinate than in a superior position. What other general can be named who did not believe that his country's good lay in his promotion?

It is legitimate in this connection for the House to take notice of the rewards which by example invited Hunt to seek other fields of action. Sherman, Thomas, Reynolds, Ricketts, Griffin, and many others distinguished in the war were Hunt's coequals in the Mexican war, and were engaged in the same branch of the service there he was, namely, in the artillery. They, by passing from that branch of the service, came almost instantly to the command of brigades, divisions, corps, and armies. No man conversant with the character and ability of General Hunt can question but what had he abandoned the branch of service to which he had dedicated himself he would at least have equaled or surpassed many of the officers to whom I have called the attention of the House.

On the question of law which is submitted by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] it will be noticed that the Court of Claims, passing upon an almost absolutely like case, have raised a distinction between rank and office which does away with the objection presented by Mr. REED. In volume 15 Court of Claims Reports, page 151, the case of T. J. Wood, Second United States Cavalry, will be found this decision, the syllabus of which is as follows:

I. The distinction between "office," "rank," and "grade" in the Army examined and stated.

II. Appointments to office can be made only by the executive branch of the Government in the manner provided by the Constitution (Article II, section 2), and not by Congressional enactment.

III. Congress may retire an officer from active service and place him on the retired-list upon a rank different from that which attaches to his office by general laws, and may change the mere rank of an officer on the active or retired list at pleasure, without coming in conflict with the Constitution.

Here it will be noticed that the distinction is taken between a person who holds an office and the rank of the office so held—between rank and office. If a person shall not hold an office at the time Congress attempts by legislation to confer it upon him, then the case is open to the objection of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], namely, that the attempt on the part of Congress to promote a person not an officer to an officer by law is to encroach upon the proper province of the Executive. But that is not this case, and consequently it is not obnoxious to that objection. General Hunt, unlike General Porter, unlike General Grant, holds an office in the Army of the United States to-day. The executive power has been exercised in his case; he has been clothed with the office; he has it now.

The question presented for the consideration of the House is, whether or not it can, without objection under the laws, confer upon him an additional rank in that office. General Wood (whose case is cited in Court of Claims) was retired by an act of Congress as a major-general. By a subsequent act of Congress he was reduced in rank from major-general to brigadier-general, and consequently the case before the Court of Claims from which I cite. The court, construing these laws and discussing this whole question, held that it is within the power of Congress either to confer a rank or to take away a rank. That, I take it, settles the question of law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as to the precedents in this case. I care little or nothing about the question of consistency, for consistency is commonly the refuge of weak minds, but I have taken occasion to examine the record of the vote upon the question of the appointment of Ulysses S. Grant to the office of general upon the retired-list of the Army of the United States, and I find there that, moved either by an overpowering sense of patriotism, or by an overpowering sense of duty, or because for the moment he slept upon the requirements of the law and the Constitution, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] voted "ay" upon the passage of that bill.

Mr. Chairman, all I have to say is this: Nobody loves the daring and genial leader of this side of the House better than I do, and nobody is more ready to follow him than I am, but I take it that in this case he simply made a mistake as to who it was that was "whipping the devil around the stump." We have a right to follow his example in voting on another bill like that wherein he set the example (U. S. Grant), and I do not think he has any right to rebuke us for it.

One word, Mr. Chairman, about the policy of all this, a question which seems to weigh heavily upon the minds of some gentlemen here. I take it, sir, that our minds meet upon this proposition that, both as a matter of sentiment and as a matter of duty, we regard it as incumbent upon us to see to it that the country shall deal justly and generously with the men who came to its rescue in the day of its peril, and that without reference to the chance of rank.

Our friends find a grievance in the fact that this bill proposes to confer a reward upon a major-general, which somehow renders it obnoxious to their theories of good government, in that the private soldier in some manner, I can not understand how, is to be placed at a disadvantage by it. How is a private soldier to be injured by justice to a major-general?

I do not understand it, sir. I can not comprehend it. If there was from this any disadvantage to come to the private soldier I confess I should not only hesitate in advocating this bill, but, if I so understood it, I too would vote against it. If any evil could come to any private soldier by reason of justice being done to Henry J. Hunt, I know that he would wish me to refuse to vote for his promotion. But how can that come? How can it be that, in any manner, any disadvantage can come to the private soldier from this legislation? There is no tribunal, there is no Department, having either legal or equitable powers, other than the Congress, to which the case of General Hunt can be referred.

There is a department, having at least legal powers, to which the case of the soldier, private or officer, complaining of injuries or asking pension, can go for action, and, if his case be proven, for reward. But, notwithstanding this department, this House, on every Friday night since I have been a member of it, has voted to place all meritorious private soldiers and officers, their widows and orphans, on the pension-roll. These are private bills; so is Hunt's; and if Congress has power, and it is policy, to do equity to the private soldier in defiance of the findings of the Pension Office, why not do equity to General Hunt?

He did what he could for his country, and so did we of the rank and file. Who raises the question of rank and seeks with it to stifle the demands of justice? Courage furnished the only rank that did not fade in the face of death, and that rank Hunt had and we loved him for it. It was an army of equals, and let those beware who seek to sharpen the daggers of difference and hate. If it is good policy for the Congress to pass the cases of officers and men that come to this House from the Pension Office marked "rejected," as I believe it is, then it is no less policy and patriotism to do even-handed justice to General Hunt.

The private pension cases come here with a statement upon their face to the effect that the applicants have no legal claim upon the Government; but this House, moved by its patriotism, moved by its sense of duty, moved by what you will, puts the names of those applicants upon the pension-roll and votes them in the aggregate hundreds of thousands of dollars. If the gentleman from Wisconsin wishes to be logical and, according to his own argument, just, let him oppose the pensioning of all claimants, resisting all special legislation in the interest of the unpensioned millions. He will not do this; he will vote against Thomas and Grant and Hancock and Hunt—making it a virtue to oppose the few where he dare not oppose the many. Let me say that the man who opposes justice to an officer would if he dared oppose justice to a private; and if the gentleman from Wisconsin thinks he is doing the men of the rank and file a service by defeating justice to a brave leader by the cry of possible injustice to private soldiers he is mistaken. We ask only justice for ourselves, and that justice which we ask for ourselves we freely accord to others. The gentleman from Wisconsin professes to be in favor of a pension to all. So am I to all who rendered honorable service. But he knows, as does every sensible soldier, that to demand everything means to secure nothing. What the soldiers want is not those "who speak the word, but those who do the will."

Now, if it is just and wise to bestow pensions upon thousands of men who have been denied that reward by the Pension Department, by what argument in reason, patriotism, or law are we estopped from bestowing justice upon this man who to our glory held a position other than that of a private soldier? Not that I will not vote to pension the prisoners of the war, because I will; not that I will not vote to repeal the arrears-of-pension act, because I will; not that I will not vote for any measure which will in any wise ameliorate the condition of my comrades in arms during the late war, because I will. But notwithstanding my willingness to do this, I will also vote to do justice to Henry J. Hunt.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, it will be difficult for me in fifteen minutes to wipe away the misstatements uttered in the former debate, which have had the tendency to mislead the House on this question, and to call attention to the salient or rather the weak points of the proposition now before us; but I will attempt to do so.

I desire first to correct an erroneous statement, accidentally made no doubt, which will be found on page 2550 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this session. I find there the following colloquy:

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question for information? As he is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I would like him to state what is the pay now being received by Colonel Hunt as a retired officer?

Mr. LAIRD. I am frank to answer that I do not know. It is not a question of dollars and cents.

Mr. BRAGG. I will answer. It is $2,625.

Mr. STEELE. I think the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. BRAGG] is mistaken. Probably he does not count in the longevity-pay.

Mr. BRAGG. After five years' retired-pay the longevity-pay commences, and is estimated on the retired-pay proper, the officer drawing after five years' service 10 per cent., after ten years' service 20 per cent., and so on.

Mr. STEELE. I think a colonel after twenty years' service gets $1,500, and when retired gets three-fourths of that amount.

Mr. BRAGG. I have the official Army pay-roll before me.

Mr. STEELE. What, then, is the pay of a colonel after twenty years' service?

Mr. BRAGG. The pay of a colonel on the retired-list is $2,625.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me important that the amount of pay now received by this officer should be correctly stated. By reference to page 378 of the Army Register I find that the sum indicated by my colleague [Mr. BRAGG] as $2,625 is incorrect, and that the actual amount is, in precise figures, $3,375. Thus we have one thing officially established, that the present pay of this officer whose case is now under consideration is $3,375 per annum, or $281.25 per month. I may state in this same connection that the effect of this bill, if passed, will be to increase this sum to $5,625, an increase of $2,250 per annum.

Having corrected that mistake, I propose now to call attention to another fact. On page 2569 of the RECORD of this session I find the following:

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire to antagonize the gentleman who has just spoken. I regret the necessity of taking this bill before the House in its full session. I remember distinctly having heard, and having seen in the RECORD, the same argument and the same speech made by the gentleman one year ago at an evening session in connection with the pension to the widow of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas.

Mr. Chairman, on page 1666 of the RECORD of the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress is one of the speeches referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. On page 2568 of the RECORD of the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress is the other speech, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said are identical. Thus it comes to be telegraphed away to Wisconsin that the gentleman from Pennsylvania "made a very sharp and cutting reply" to the gentleman from Wisconsin. I wish to say upon this point simply this: If the statement were true as a fact of history, it would only place me in the uncomfortable position of being able to make only one speech in two years. [Laughter.] But when the gentleman examines the two speeches, he will discover that they are not alike—not the "same speech."

Mr. BINGHAM. Not in idea?

Mr. PRICE. The same underlying principle governs every honest man in the transaction of business, public or private, and I argued from the same premises; but the same words, the same arrangement of words or sentences, will not be found there. The two speeches were by the same man, but they were not the "same speech." [Applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. But the sentiment was the same.

Mr. PRICE. Certainly. So that when you eliminate from the charge the element of insincerity or mistake, you have eliminated from it all its point and all its pith.

I desire now to call the attention of my friend from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] to a few strictures in relation to this subject made when he had the floor a few days ago.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will it interrupt my friend from Wisconsin if I ask him to state, as he has the Army Register before him, just what pay General Hunt now draws on the retired-list?

Mr. PRICE. I am willing to restate it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I was on the other side of the House and could not hear the gentleman's former statement.

Mr. PRICE. I distinctly state that the present pay of Lieutenant-Colonel Hunt is $281.25 per month, or $3,375 per annum. Gentlemen will find it on page 378 of the Army Register for 1886.

My distinguished friend from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] says:

I admit we have sinned against the judgment of some gentlemen who were conspicuous in the pursuits of peace during the four years of this war.

No man, Mr. Chairman, honors the American soldier more than I do. To his valor and to his devotion we are indebted for a country and a flag. To the fact that at the close of the strife he took his place modestly in the ranks of the producers of national wealth we are indebted for the unexampled rapidity with which we have bounded along the path of national progress during the last quarter of a century. [Applause.]

As a rule, his bravery on the battlefield is only equaled by his modesty in not demanding special recognition beyond what is accorded to him by an appreciative and grateful people.

But the rule had one exception in the Forty-eighth Congress, in the instance of a gentleman who only rode as a member of a staff, as my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] told us he did. And now comes the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD], and with a sneer would silence discussion on this subject on the part of those who "were conspicuous in the pursuits of peace during the four years of war" because they were civilians and not soldiers.

I have, Mr. Chairman, laid it down as a fundamental principle of political action that as all soldiers could not be made commanders, we should extend equal consideration to those who were commanded, as the part they performed in the great drama was as important and as necessary as the other; the foundation-stone of a building being as important a part of the structure as the dome that reflects the sunlight above it. [Applause.]

And to the gentleman from Nebraska I submit that those who were "conspicuous in the pursuits of peace," if they were loyal to their Government, if their hearts beat high with hope or throbbed with anxiety as her starry banner floated in victory or was trailed in the dust of defeat, if they did what they could, if it were only to prepare lint and bandages for the wounded, should not be taunted or relegated to the rear, but are entitled to as much consideration as the men who commanded in our armies. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, having disposed of this subject, I wish to call the attention of the House for a moment to where we are drifting in this direction. I claim it is unjust, destructive, injurious, contrary to the spirit and genius of our American Government that any of these distinctions should be made either as to place, position, rank, or pay.

For the purpose of calling attention to that point, permit me for one moment to refer to the pension-list of England; for these gentlemen who speak about the propriety of an appropriation of this character will tell you, "Why, look at England." Very well, then, let us look at England. Why are we here upon this continent? Why did the Pilgrim Fathers leave England? It was simply because of that system of laws by which they were oppressed, and which recognized but two classes, the rulers and the subjects. They came here to build up a better standard of government, based upon the idea that every man was the equal of every other man, and that no distinction should be recognized because of rank or wealth.

Let me call your attention to the pension-list of England:

That is 66 per cent. in excess of our national revenue; and yet gentlemen will stand upon this floor under this republican form of government, in this the last quarter of the nineteenth century, and undertake to justify these innovations in our republican system by referring to what is done in England.

Nor is that all. From 1838 to 1878, under the present sovereign, the annual payment of the civil-list pensions amounted to $920,442. In addition pensions were granted to sovereigns in perpetuity. There were also ancient and hereditary pensions to a large extent. Speaking on this subject John Bright said:

> The more you examine this matter the more you will conclude, as I have, that this is neither more nor less than a gigantic system of wrong.

This is the feast to which these gentlemen would invite us. This is the policy which these gentlemen would ask us to pursue. The inevitable tendency of it is to lead this American Republic to useless, wasteful, dishonest expenditure of public money.

Mr. LAIRD. Allow me to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PRICE. Certainly; although I have not much time to spare.

Mr. LAIRD. Are you not in favor of placing all soldiers and officers upon the pension-roll?

Mr. PRICE. Yes, sir, every one of them; and if General Hunt were not a pensioner on the Treasury now to the amount of $3,375 a year and were in need, I would join hands with the gentleman from Nebraska and say that as one of the country's defenders he is entitled to the support and protection of his Government.

The gentleman tells us this is a great country. I know it is, and I want to keep it so. I want to say, in my judgment, he does no honor to the memory of the men who are dead or to the character of those now living when he undertakes to revolutionize the principle for which they fought so gallantly, when he seeks to establish another principle adverse, contradictory, and antagonistic to that for whch they sacrificed so much to establish and preserve. [Applause.]

By this pension-list we get some idea of the English nobility. The working classes are in a condition most deplorable, many of them living underground, ill paid, worse fed and clothed, and their moral and intellectual natures even more neglected than their physical; and as a legitimate sequence of all this we read of fifty thousand citizens of London, crazed by hunger and maddened by oppression, breaking over all legal restraints, setting the police power at defiance, and sacking the city. And this is the feast that gentlemen on this floor invite the American people to. And yet the wage-workers of England fare sumptuously in comparison with their Irish colonists, whose wages are so low as to debar them from the common decencies of life, while their substance is squandered on the privileged few. Gentlemen may justify themselves in thus lavishing the public revenues on pets and favorites because monarchical countries pursue this policy—a policy repugnant to all our traditions, at variance with our institutions, and which does violence to our republican system of government. But as like causes produce like effects, so will this unrepublican system, if persisted in, produce in our own fair land the nihilist of Russia, the socialist of Germany, and the communist of France.

In other and stronger governments than ours the unequal distribution of wealth leads to an unequal distribution of power.

But in this country you can not, if you would, reduce wages as in Ireland to 4 pence, or as in India to 5 cents per day. Nor as in India, establish the legal rate of interest at 30 to 60 per cent.

Nor is it any more practicable than desirable that in this country the tenant should be compelled to pay the landlord one-half of his produce, or as in France one-third, or as in England and Scotland one-fourth.

If we would secure for this Republic all its magnificent possibilties, if we are true to ourselves and the sacred trust reposed in us, we will here and now call a halt, proceed no farther in this direction, but go back to a recognition of the principle underlying our Government, that all men are equal before the law, that public places of trust are duties temporarily imposed by the whole on a part, that the places are to be filled and the duties discharged for a while and then surrendered to those who conferred them, and again the officer becomes the private citizen, entitled to no more nor no less consideration because of his place or position, nor to no more nor less consideration because of the success he may have had or not had in filling them, but to be entitled to honorable mention only to the extent to which he strove to faithfully and unselfishly discharge those duties. [Applause.]

All over the land to-day there are heard the mutterings of discontent among the people; and thoughtful men are dismayed at the unrest of the people and their threatened or open rebellion against the laws.

If this House were to postpone the consideration of all other matters now before it for a month and focus their whole thought on this one danger and the best means of averting it, it would be time well spent.

Is it not true that much of that discontent is directly attributable to a conviction that they have been unfairly dealt with? And is not the enactment of such laws as contemplated in this bill a ground for discontent and distrust of us?

Will the people not ask why the men whom they have sent here should vote an allowance to a retired officer of over $5,000, who is receiving now the sum of $3,775 per annum, while many, oh, so many who are more needy and equally meritorious, because they did what they could, are denied a mere pittance?

This Government can only endure so long as the people are attached to it. I do not mean so long as the brigadier-generals or the generals or the colonels are attached to it, but I mean as well the obscure and undistinguished—the whole people. [Applause.]

Then in the name of patriotism, in the name of justice, in the name of enlightened selfishness, let us be just to all classes. Do not farther follow this bad system because we may have some worse precedents. Let us weigh the act in the scales of justice, though it may be to violate a hundred bad precedents. Let us make a better, because a juster, precedent for others to follow.

[During the delivery of the foregoing remarks the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. LAIRD. How much additional time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. PRICE. I should like to have about five minutes longer.

Mr. LAIRD. I will yield to the gentleman five minutes if I have the time and can be recognized for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has been exhausted. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PRICE. I thank the gentleman from Nebraska for his effort to give me additional time.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, I very much hope that this bill will receive, as it has heretofore received, the favorable consideration of this House. If there be a man whose name is borne upon the rolls of the Army who is deserving of the pension that this bill proposes to confer upon Major-General Hunt, this officer is the man. There are already upon the retired-list, promoted to the position of major-general from the rank of colonel, two officers, Ricketts and Carroll, each of whom was promoted and placed upon the retired-list with the rank of major-general, holding himself, at the time of his promotion, simply the rank of colonel. Major-General Hunt has served his entire life in the Army. He was one of the most distinguished officers of the Army. He held and exercised the command of major-general without the pay for years. He is a man whose wants, though I dislike to allude to that, themselves appeal to the consideration of this House in placing him in a position where he can properly sustain those who rely upon him for support.

Why, sir, it has been said that there is no difference between a major-general and a private soldier. In some respects that is entirely true; both are men. There are many private soldiers who can run logs on a river a great deal better than Major-General Hunt could do. There are a great many men who can eat more than he can eat, and many who can lift more at a dead lift than he can lift, if these are to be the standards by which you measure men.

But, sir, we see all over this country and all over the civilized world that monuments, tablets, memorials are erected in memory of men, and why? Because they stamped the impress of their individuality upon the current events of their day. They are men who by their exertions, characters, and lives have brought honor not only to themselves but honor and reputation to the history of the country.

They are men of whose reputation the country at large is proud, because they made the history of their country glorious in their day by their acts.

We ask that we shall not wait for posthumous events to do justice to the memory of Major-General Hunt, but that it be done now in his declining years, old and moving about as he does among our citizens, dressed in the plainest garb of the ordinary citizen, proud, as my colleague from Nebraska [Mr. LAIRD] stated. Ah, he is proud; and why? Not that he belongs to the royal family, but proud that he had the opportunity and the ability to stamp the name of Henry J. Hunt upon the records and history of his country, where it will live as long as American history lives.

That is what he is proud of. He is proud of his manhood, proud of his citizenship, proud that he is an American citizen, and the American people will be proud to see honor done him at all times and under all circumstances.

Men are not all alike. It is a peculiar characteristic of mankind that it needs a leader. Why else do we have leaders? Why do we have officers in the Army if all the rank and file possess the same qualities as the officers? Gather together five thousand men to-day for any purpose, and what do they do? They elect a chairman, do they not? And when they desire to have things formulated and considered they appoint a committee. They select for that committee men whom they consider capable men, who have studied the subject, men whose ideas when placed on paper will carry with them force and give to the meeting credit abroad among the people.

Take your five thousand men and send them across the Potomac to fight the battles of the country, and what will they do? Without officers, they will meet and select officers. Whom will they select? They will select a man whom they recognize to be as brave as the bravest. They will select a man who has skill, who has cool nerve, a man who is rich and fertile in expedients, a man cautious withal, so as not to be guilty of any rash act of indiscretion. And last of all they will select a man, if they can find him, who by his own force, courage, and energy, and by the peculiar magnetism which he may possess, will distribute that same force and character throughout the five thousand men he is to command, and when they find such a leader as that then they are ready to press forward to victory.

Is that man to be rated the same as those men that he leads? Scott had it right when he said of such a man, that "one blast upon his bugle-horn was worth a thousand men." Without such a man those people who seek to call themselves an army are a disorganized mob. Their effectiveness depends upon the man who commands, and when you speak of the man in his military capacity and service, you speak of the man who made the five thousand or the ten thousand men an army, or part of an army. Other men are put in their places. But, sir, to make a homely illustration, such a man as I have described is the hub into which the spokes are inserted and upon which the felly is placed. That makes the wheel. When the hub fails, the spokes and felly are all gone to the devil, useless and worthless.

It is in that view that I present the case of Henry J. Hunt, the man that organized the splendid artillery of the Army of the Potomac, the man who adhered to his own line in his profession, because his military chief recognized that there was none in it his equal.

Major-General Hunt is deaf to-day—from what? From the roar of his artillery at Malvern Hill when he sent howling back the confederate force that sought to drive the Army of the Potomac into the James. He may be deaf, but the people of the United States are not deaf to the appeal that is made on his behalf that he shall be recognized. From there he went on, and at Gettysburg again, with that splended array of artillery, he broke the confederate line. Ay, in the last final charge—the like of which no country ever saw—led by Pickett, of Virginia, with his pet division, they melted away before the artillery placed in position by Henry J. Hunt. How many private soldiers could have taken the range and caliber of those guns and pointed the place to which they should be assigned that they might do the execution which saved the day for the American Union? It is for that man, Henry J. Hunt of Malvern Hill, Henry J. Hunt of Gettysburg, that I ask on behalf of the Army of the Potomac and of all the soldiers of all the armies of the Potomac that this body recognize him as they have before recognized him, by giving to him what he ought to have had years since, the rank and pay of major-general of the armies of the United States upon the retired list.

Mr. BINGHAM. I regret exceedingly that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. PRICE] who spoke a short time ago has seen proper to animadvert on a statement I made in debate a week or two ago in connection with the pension case of Mrs. General Hancock. The gentleman charges that I misstated the record. I stated briefly, as the gentleman has stated also, that I remembered distinctly having heard and having seen in the RECORD the same argument and the same speech made by the gentleman one year ago at an evening session in connection with the pension of the widow of Maj. Gen. George H. Thomas. I assert that that declaration is substantially correct. I might say to the gentlemen who listened to the gentleman this morning, that when the question is before the House of pensioning any general officer, or when there is any question pertaining to pensions, the gentleman gives us the same old speech about the private soldier of the Army. It has the same ring; it has not the same body of words, but it has the same substratum and is the same argument.

I say to him that the private soldiers of the country or of the army of the war of the rebellion are not knocking at our doors for pensions. The maimed, the wounded, and the disabled are appealing to Congress for recognition, but the strong and the healthy soldiers of the war are making no appeals to this House.

What gave the gentleman the right to champion the cause of the soldiers of the war? Is it the record that he is continually making in this House, that he is in favor of communism in the matter of striking down all the leadership of the war? Will the private soldier of the Union Army turn to the man who voted against Grant, against the widow of Thomas, against the widow of Hancock? Speaking as a soldier, I say that they will accept and select upon this floor another leadership and another championship.

Let me say to the gentleman that in his two speeches to which I have referred, the speech on Thomas and that on Hancock, there are but two or three underlying ideas. First, he claims that legislation of this character violates the principles of equal rights, and he antagonizes what he denominates "class legislation." Let me briefly refer to what he said in the Thomas case. He says of Thomas—

> He fought and suffered and struggled that this might continue to be a free Government, by a free people; to preserve the right of every man, woman, and child to be the equal of every other before the law; that the benign and beneficent influence of its protecting arms might be thrown equally around all classes and all conditions of people; that the unworthy should suffer equal punishment, be he pauper or millionaire, and that equal meed of praise or reward should be extended to all who discharged equally well their social and political duties in whatever niche in life they might be placed.
> He defended for us the principle that—
>
> Honor and shame from no condition rise;
> Act well your part, there all the honor lies.
> And we are violating this principle when we select this or any similar case and make it a matter of special legislation, to the exclusion of thousands of cases equally meritorious—admitting for this case all the merit that can possibly be claimed for it—that appeal to us daily all over our land, not for alms, but for simple justice.

What does he say in relation to Hancock? Speaking of the question, the pension then under consideration, he uses this language:

> Such a policy as this contemplates is detrimental to the whole principle of manhood and equal rights. Its tendency is vicious and corrupting; for it is liable to create a spirit of reckless, wasteful expenditures. We should rather teach these men to live on a basis of economy; not to live to the utmost of their means, up to their last dollar, indulging in an array of fuss and feathers, champagne and luxury, and then die and leave their families nothing but their dependence upon the Government. I repeat, let them exercise the same economy that I do and my constituents exercise, and then they would be self-supporting and not leave dependent families.
> The compensation of a major-general or any other man occupying a high rank in the military service is extremely liberal. It is not so meager that he can not be self-sustaining. I do not know whose measure this is particularly, but I am going to assist in this one effort to break down a system that tends to weaken a man's self-reliance, a system that even the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania can find no excuse for except upon the score of precedents heretofore adopted. He proposes now to increase the number of precedents, and no man can find an argument for it. It shocks every principle of manhood. It violates every known cardinal idea of equal rights and equal justice. It is a principle that tends to create a privileged class, and fosters and induces an expenditure on the part of public men not in harmony with their surroundings or with the principles of simplicity and economy commended by every good man, including Grover Cleveland.

These are the basic, the cardinal principles of the gentleman's speeches on both occasions. They took but a few moments to utter; it was, I think, a five-minute or a ten-minute debate, and I claim that I am substantially correct when I make the statement that the speech in both cases was the same—not word for word, I concede to the gentleman, but the same underlying ideas were enunciated in both in the expression of his antagonism to those two bills similar in character.

One word more. The gentleman claims to come before this House time and again, and at every opportunity, to ask for the pensioning of the great body of the private soldiers of the war, who have never asked for pensions. The other evening, in the debate to which I have referred, he quoted certain language uttered by Grover Cleveland enunciating a doctrine that I appreciate and indorse in every particular. I read it:

> "Men in official positions should not forget that they are still of the people and may do much by their plain habits of living to inaugurate and encourage a system of economy among the people that tends much to national prosperity." And further: "The right of the Government to assess the earnings of the people is bounded by the necessities of the Government economically administered."

Let the gentleman carry out the legislation that he is continually urging here for placing on the pension-roll all the soldiers of the war, and then let him see whether he can apply his quotation from Grover Cleveland to that legislation, which he suggests.

There was one part of the gentleman's speech, I will concede, in which he did not convey the same idea that he uttered in the Thomas speech. In that speech he paid a great and eloquent and most glorious tribute to General Thomas. His words are worth repeating here or elsewhere in any assembly for the consideration of public questions. But for some reason he failed to render a tribute to the great soldier of the North, General Hancock, like that which he had previously paid to the great soldier of the West, General Thomas. Let us see how he referred to General Hancock:

I am not a military man, Mr. Chairman, but from the best information I have been able to gather on inquiry from those who are acquainted with the facts, I learn that there has been paid to General Hancock, brilliant, brave, generous, magnificent in all his proportions—

Was the slang of the campaign of a few years ago still ringing in the gentleman's ears when he used the expression, "magnificent in all his proportions?"— as we all recognize him to be as a military man, the sum of $165,000 during the last twenty-two years, besides perquisites and other compensation which would make a sum at least equal to one-half the amount which I have named.

Is that the tribute that the gentleman should have yielded to this brave soldier when he is on record as having paid the eloquent tribute I have read to that great soldier of the West? But that did not seem to satisfy the gentleman on that occasion. He seemed to think he should go a step further and give advice to Army officers to live economically and not come to Congress for consideration. Speaking of this bill he said:

We should rather teach these men—

What men? The only men who had been referred to were Thomas and Hancock—

We should rather teach these men to live on the basis of economy, not to live to the utmost of their means, up to the last dollar, indulging in an array of fuss and feathers, champagne and luxury, and then die and leave their families nothing.

If the gentleman states that this part of his speech is not similar to the tribute he paid to Thomas, then I concede he is correct. But I make the unqualified declaration that in this House the gentleman sings but one song; and it is a song not acceptable to that great audience the private soldiers of the country, that he seems to be singing for. This House, however, has rendered to myself as well as to all the soldiers on this floor who defended that pension to Mrs. Hancock all that we have asked for. The gentleman is welcome to his record. I bid him all hail in his future efforts to prove its consistency. I have no doubt he can. He has proved it in his antagonism to Grant, in his antagonism to Thomas, in his antagonism to Hancock. He can continue that course; but this House has seen proper to render the tribute that every loyal, patriotic people have rendered to the brave and courageous leadership that has led them to victory and the consummation of great constitutional results. The gentleman is welcome to his record; but this House has made the record of giving to that matchless soldier of the West Thomas the same tribute of recollection and reward that it has given to the man who led the masterful armies of the North at Gettysburg and throughout the four years of the war. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I object to this bill in the first place because by its very terms it admits that we can not do directly what the bill seeks to do indirectly.

In the second place, Mr. Chairman, General Hunt, from the day on which he entered the Military Academy at West Point to this day, has received the compensation and emoluments which the laws of his country have accorded to him. He has received the promotion and the rank to which in the arm of the service in which he was engaged he was entitled. He advanced to the highest place in that arm of the service. It is too late to go back now over the four years of the war to readjust promotions or to correct the inequalities and injustices (and there were many) of that war. You can not do it. It is utterly impossible. You might as well attempt to restore the island of Ischia after the earthquake had scattered it in the sea.

Whether General Hunt should have had a higher rank or not I shall not now discuss. He had the rank which the laws of his country gave him during the war. It is stated here that he might have entered another arm of the service and been promoted. But what would have been his fate if he had no man can tell. No man can tell whether he would have risen in another arm of the service, or, like many another, have gone down on the battlefield and received no promotion at all. Many an officer was killed early in the war who probably if he had lived might have risen to the very highest rank. These are things we can not tell, and ought not to undertake now to readjust or change. General Hunt is now receiving the pay of a colonel of artillery on the retired-list. The laws of his country give him that. To this he is entitled and to this only. To make an exception in his case, to go back and increase his rank, to promote him now twenty-one years after the close of the war—that I do not believe we are called upon to do. I must assume that he received at the hands of those who were then charged with the responsibility the considerations due him.

A word, Mr. Chairman, with respect to some remarks of my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG].

I grant the necessity of officers in an army. I recognize the value of great leaders, and I recognize the ability, the bravery, the gallantry of Colonel Hunt as an artillery officer. But the officers did not make the army; rather the army made the officers. Much is due, undoubtedly, to capable, efficient, and brave officers. But it was the army that gave renown to its officers, and to some it gave renown whom it could not make great. Every officer who gained distinction in the late war owed more to his army than his army owed to him.

What millions died that Cæsar might be great!

This is the teaching of all history. Millions die, and a few are made great.

Soldiers who fight in the ranks and are soon forgotten win fame for a few. How much of General Hunt's fame was made for him by his captains and the men who manned the guns will never be told. In the artillery arm of the service especially almost everything depends in action on the captains who command batteries and the men who man them. No man would take from General Hunt his fame; but the tendency of history in this age, as in all past ages, to gather all the laurels won on battlefields and make crowns of them for a few men I do not believe in. If the credit that was due to the men who participated in the late war could be meted out in just proportions to what each contributed, history would tell a different tale from that it now tells; a much less share would be found due to those who have been made great, and much more to those who have had little credit, and who will be lost entirely to history.

Mr. Chairman, I do not believe we are called upon in any view of this case, whether in justice to General Hunt or in any other view of the case, to make an exception and grant a promotion to an officer on the retired-list. We are increasing from day to day and year to year the extent and cost of the retired-list of the Army and Navy. Three thousand dollars is not a small sum in these times, when $3,000 is of more value relatively to cost of living than $5,000 was twenty years ago. Let me call attention in this connection to a few statistics—very brief, but very significant.

According to the census of 1880 the agricultural laborers of the United States were 7,670,000. What were their average earnings? Two hundred and eighty-nine dollars for each laborer. Three million eight hundred thousand were engaged in manufacturing and mining. Their average earnings was $350 a year each. From these meager earnings families must be supported and educated. The total earnings of the 11,400,000 people engaged in these pursuits in the census year was $3,600,000,000, or about $315 each. Add to these the 1,800,000 engaged in trade and transportation, with average earnings of $500 each, and 4,000,000 engaged in professional and personal services, with earnings on the average of $400 each, and we have 17,270,000 employed in agriculture, in manufacturing and mining, in trade and transportation, in professional and personal service, and the average earnings of all classes was only about $352 each for the year.

But we think nothing of paying $2,000, $3,000, or $5,000. It is only a matter of appropriating so much out of the Treasury. Now, there is no fund out of which to pay these bounties or the expenses of the Government except to go first to the people and collect it into the Treasuary by taxation.

These 17,270,000 engaged in the various occupations indicated create the wealth from which must come all taxes. All taxes and all expenditures must come from the annual produce of the country. There is no other fund. And, Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come when this House in voting away money by thousands and by millions of dollars should consider how that money must be raised; how it gets into the Treasury; who pays it, and what their earnings are, or how small a sum they who create the wealth can retain for themselves. The aggregate earnings of the 17,270,000 engaged in all occupations in the census year was but about $6,100,000,000, or, as before given, about $352 each. The more that is taken in the form of taxes to carry on Government the less there is left for the people to have to themselves.

Why, sir, our Government costs us more than 10 per cent. of the gross earnings of the people to carry it on, while but 10½ per cent. is required to carry on the British Government with its vast army and navy and its large public debt. We are fast reaching as high a percentage as any other country in the world, while we have almost no army, but a small navy, and a constantly decreasing public debt. The time will come when the people, finding this burden of taxation increasing from day to day and year to year upon them—the time will come, I say, when they will demand that expenditures of this kind shall be restricted, shall be limited to a reasonable allowance, and that expenditures generally shall be restricted to the actual needs of Government. [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER addressed the committee. [See Appendix.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I did not think to participate in this debate at all. When this bill was before the House and the committee in the last Congress I cast my vote in favor of it. There are some points which discriminate this bill from any other bill that has been reported or will be reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

I do not think that too much can be said on this floor or elsewhere in honor of General Hunt as a soldier or as a military organizer, nor can too much be said in praise of his services to his country.

The only question that gives me any pause whatsoever is in regard to the advisability of either establishing, or continuing if already established, the principle of granting further promotions after retirement from active service in the Army.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is General Hunt on the retired-list now?

Mr. CUTCHEON. He is. He is at present the governor of the Soldiers' Home in the District of Columbia.

General Hunt became a colonel of volunteers in the war—I think in 1861. He was made a brigadier-general of volunteers in 1862, and was brevetted a major-general for gallant and meritorious services, also I I think in 1862, although I have not referred to the dates. There is no question but that he had a command which in men, material, and animals was equal to the command of any major-general in the Army, equal beyond all doubt to an army corps.

From the time he took command as chief of the reserve artillery under General McClellan, with a very brief intermission at the time he came from the Peninsula to Acquia Creek to forward the batteries to Pope, and then resumed his command on the 5th of September, 1862, when McClellan was restored to command, he was in full command of the artillery arm of the service in the Army of the Potomac. General Hunt held that command at the battle of South Mountain and at the great battle of Antietam, which was to a great extent an artillery battle, and turned back the tide of Lee's first invasion of the North. It was General Henry J. Hunt that opened upon the confederate line and defenses with his three hundred and forty guns at Fredricksburg. It was Hunt who commanded the artillery at Chancellorsville. It was General Hunt, as has been said again and again during the course of this debate, who placed our batteries when Pickett's famous charge was made on Cemetery Ridge at Gettysburg, who shattered their advance and sent them to the rear in rout and disaster. It was not an ordinary man's foresight that placed the batteries on that occasion, but the consummate skill and genius of a master mind; and it is in recognition of this fact, both in the Army of this country as well as throughout the armies of the civilized world, that Henry J. Hunt stands the foremost artillerist that lives or has lived upon the American continent.

The order of General Hunt organizing the artillery of the Army of the Potomac is to-day the formula by which the artillery arm in all of the military nations of Europe is organized.

I have been told very recently by General Benét, Chief of Ordnance of our service, that General Hunt is to-day recognized as the best authority as to the artillery arm of the service in all of the great armies of the world.

So much for his genius, so much for his skill. But I have not yet recounted his services. After the battle of Gettysburg he continued in the command of the artillery of the Army of the Potomac until the close of the war and the surrender of the confederate armies. It was Hunt's artillery that thundered at the Wilderness. It was Hunt's artillery that, converging on the bloody angle at Spottsylvania Court House, made possible Hancock's impetuous charge and victory, sweeping away forty-five hundred of Johnson's division.

It was Hunt that commanded the artillery at North Anna, at Totopotomy, and at Cold Harbor. It was Hunt that encircled the confederate works at Petersburg with his batteries, and hammered away until Petersburg fell, and with Petersburg Richmond, and with Richmond the confederacy.

There can be no question about the merits of General Hunt. They have passed into history, and he is recognized as the foremost artillerist that this continent has produced. Then why did he not get rank in proportion to his merit? Why did he not get the rank of major-general in the Army of the United States? Why has he not been further promoted? Simply because under the organization of our artillery arm during the war at first each battery was considered a regiment, and was organized upon that basis, but with field officers. But before the time came for organization of the Army into corps and divisions that rule was reversed, and each battery was held to be a company and not entitled to field officers. And under both rulings all promotion was cut off. Unlike the infantry arm and the cavalry arm, there was no room for major-generals in the artillery service.

So the war ended, and left General Hunt a brigadier-general of volunteers. In 1866 he mustered out as such. He fell back then on his rank in the regular Army. He was not at that time a full colonel, but in 1869 he became colonel of the Fifth Artillery.

By and by the time came when General Hunt should have been promoted by right of seniority of sevice and of distinction, but for reasons which I do not understand and which therefore I can not undertake to explain, when the time came that there was a vacancy and when Hunt ought, in my opinion, to have been promoted, another and a younger man was appointed, perhaps because Hunt had become deaf in his country's service. Mackenzie was promoted to a brigadier-generalship in the regular Army. McKenzie became insane, was sent to a lunatic asylum, and was retired, Hunt still remaining colonel. When Mackenzie was retired there was another opportunity to give Hunt his rank, but, instead of that, when Mackenzie was retired Stanley was put into the vacant brigadier-generalship; and so he has gone, by the operation of law, by reason of age, on the retired-list only as a colonel, with this distinguished record, an exceptional record in all respects, exceptional in service, exceptional in genius, and exceptional in the fact that he never received the promotion he was entitled to. And now there is no other way of doing justice to this man except by advancing him on the retired-list.

Mr. PETTIBONE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PETTIBONE. I ask the gentleman from Michigan whether, on the ground of what he has said, we should not make an exceptional case of this and give this officer his right rank?

Mr. CUTCHEON. That is the very thing I was going to say. I intend to vote for this bill. I do not ask that my judgment shall control that of any other man. But I shall vote for the bill on the ground indicated by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PETTIBONE] that we should make an exception of this case because the case is itself exceptional. The length and distinction of General Hunt's services, his genius, his claims which were overslaughed over and over again by younger men until at last age forced him, at sixty-four, on the retired-list, should now avail in his behalf. And I think we can now afford—this great American people can be magnanimous enough to afford—to make an exception in this case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, called for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 31, noes 40.

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. PRICE, and the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. WHEELER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 44, noes 76.

Mr. BRAGG. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

The tellers resumed the count.

Before the report was made,

Mr. BRAGG said: I do not desire to interrupt the consideration of other bills in which members of this House are interested, and therefore I withdraw the call for a quorum. But I shall insist on a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the motion submitted to the committee was that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. If the majority is in the negative the bill will not go to the House, but simply remains on the Calendar.

Mr. BRAGG. If it remains on the Calendar that is all right.

The tellers reported—ayes 49, noes 86.

Mr. McMILLIN. Do I understand correctly the Chair to intimate that this bill remains on the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. It does.

Mr. McMILLIN. For action hereafter?

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter to be determined by the committee in the future.

Mr. McMILLIN. It certainly would have some status.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has undertaken to state the effect of this vote. It is simply a negative vote upon the motion submitted. The ayes are 49, the noes are 86. The noes have it, and the motion is lost. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I think this bill is before the committee for consideration until disposed of. This motion having failed, there should be some motion to get it out of the committee. I suggest that it be reported adversely to the House.

Mr. BRAGG. Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of parliamentary law that I do not understand, and I should like to be informed a little about it. I should like to know, for instance, whether it is possible under the rules to dispose of a measure in committee so that it never can get to the House. I understand the learned parliamentarian on my left [Mr. WARNER, of Ohio] to maintain that view. I suppose that all bills have to be disposed of in the House, and this bill will go there reported, either favorably or adversely, from the Committee of the Whole, so that an opportunity will be given for the House to vote upon the bill. I am a novice in matters of this kind, and I, of course, understand that my friend from Tennessee [Mr. McMILLIN] and my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] are thoroughly versed in all these questions of parliamentary law.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will now show the gentleman how well versed I am, by moving that this bill be now reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie upon the table.

Mr. BRAGG. And upon that motion I insist that a quorum shall vote.

Mr. McMILLIN. Now we are both being informed upon parliamentary law.

Mr. BRAGG. I am very much obliged to the gentlemen for his volunteered lesson, but I knew that much before. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. As the gentleman ordinarily puts in practice all the parliamentary law he knows and did not put this in practice I presumed he did not know it. [Laughter.]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 77, noes 25.

Mr. BRAGG. There is no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The point is made that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Would it be in order at this time to move to amend this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Not while the House is dividing.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If it were, I would move to amend so as to reduce the rank to that of brigadier-general. With that amendment I think the bill would pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair appoints to act as tellers the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BRAGG]. The question is, Shall this bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table?

The House divided; and the tellers reported 67 votes in the affirmative and 5 in the negative.

Mr. BRAGG. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point being insisted upon that no quorum has yet voted, the Chair will direct the Clerk to call the roll.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has directed the Clerk to call the roll.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the pending motion be withdrawn, that the friends of the bill be allowed to move to amend it so as to reduce the rank provided for in the bill to that of brigadier-general, and that we take a test vote on that. [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Otherwise, if we proceed in this way we lose the whole day, which might be devoted to the consideration of private bills. [Renewed cries of "No!" "No!"]

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Aiken,	Eden,	Mahoney,	Riggs,
Anderson, J. A.	Ermentrout,	McAdoo,	Rockwell,

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The SPEAKER. From the report made by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole it appears that 196 members—more than a quorum—have answered to their names.

Mr. HAMMOND. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I submit that under the rules we should immediately go back into the Committee of the Whole; that the motion to adjourn or take a recess is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The practice of the House has been to entertain, in a case of this kind, a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, but no other business; because the House may determine not to sit any longer.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But the rules say distinctly that under these circumstances we must go back into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn would undoubtedly be in order; and a motion to take a recess is of the same privileged character. These motions have always been entertained under these circumstances.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But there is a special rule providing that when the roll is called in Committee of the Whole and a report is made to the House showing the presence of a quorum the House must immediately, without a motion, resolve itself again into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion is in order under the practice of the House. The question is on the motion for a recess till half past 7 o'clock this evening, the evening session being for the consideration of pension business, under the previous order of the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HAMMOND, there were—ayes 60, noes 47.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, there being—ayes 25, noes 86; more than one-fifth voting therefor.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 74, not voting 141; as follows:

So the motion for a recess was agreed to.

The following additional pairs were announced:

Mr. FREDERICK with Mr. HOLMES, for the remainder of this day.

Mr. BURNES with Mr. RYAN, for to-day.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past 7 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at half past 7 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by the Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar for the purpose of considering business under the special order for Friday evening sessions.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that members present may be allowed to call up such bills as they may think proper, suggesting that if possible only such bills be called up as are not likely to provoke discussion. I think it due to those gentlemen who come here to these evening sessions that they should have some preference in this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] asks unanimous consent that members present may be allowed to call up such bills on the Private Calendar, subject to the order of the House, as they may desire, until further order. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADAM GASTON.

Mr. MATSON. I call up the bill (H. R. 550) to restore to the pension-roll the name of Adam Gaston. It is on page 34 of the Calendar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll the name of Adam Gaston, late of Company D, One hundred and fortieth Indiana Volunteers, who held certificate 107881.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHILDREN OF SURGEON ALFRED M. OWEN.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 4689) for the relief of the children of the late Surgeon Alfred M. Owen, and to increase their pensions.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Albert T. Owen, minor children of the late Surgeon Alfred M. Owen, United States Navy, be, and they are hereby, granted and allowed a pension of $25 each per month, to date from the 22d day of August, 1883, on which day the said Surgeon Alfred M. Owen died, and to continue until each child shall respectively attain the age of twenty-one years; and the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the names of the said Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Albert T. Owen on the pension-roll at said rates, in lieu of the pensions now paid them. In paying the pensions from the day of Surgeon Alfred M. Owen's death to the date of the passage of this act, the Secretary of the Interior is directed to deduct from the amounts herein allowed the sums already received by the said Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Albert T. Owen, or their lawful guardian.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. SCOTT) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 4689, beg leave to submit the following report:

The naval career of the deceased officer, which began in May, 1869, was one of exceptional credit, and was made conspicuous by an unusually wide range of duties by sea and land. From his entry into the service until his death he was constantly employed, exercising professional attainments of a very high order, and that he dignified every duty assigned him by the zeal, courage, fidelity, and intelligence displayed in its execution, is the testimony of all who knew him.

He was always conscientious, earnest, skillful, kind, and courteous, commanding thereby the affection and confidence of the sick, and the respect and admiration of his superiors.

In February, 1882, he reported for duty at the navy-yard, Pensacola, and a few months later was combating the much-dreaded yellow fever. By his judicious sanitary provisions and personal force and courage he established a cordon of environment which preserved the naval station from the plague which devasted the neighboring city. At the height of the epidemic, when the physicians of Pensacola had been cut off by the fell disease, he bravely volunteered to go into the city to attend the afflicted.

In the following summer (1883) he was without medical assistance, performing the quadruple duty of surgeon of the navy-yard, surgeon of the naval hospital, surgeon of the reservation, and quarantine officer of the lower bay.

A return of the fever was looked for. Every officer who could be spared was permitted to leave, and this brave officer could have been detached upon application, but he scorned the thought.

August 14, 1883, the fever reappeared. Overexertion and exposure to the sun had caused Surgeon Owen a partial sun-stroke in July, and while yet suffering from this, he was, on August 16, himself seized with the fever. For two days there was no one on land to treat the hero, and on the 22d he died. His faithful wife was untiring in her efforts at his bedside, and within a day or so after his death she was stricken with the same disease; at midnight of the 29th she was buried by his side.

They left behind them four children, between the ages of three months and eight years, each of whom and their nurse also had the fever.

The committee therefore recommend that the amounts named in the bill be allowed to the four children of the deceased.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amount proposed to be allowed by this bill is very unusual. It is certainly very exorbitant in comparison with the amount ordinarily allowed. If the gentleman in charge of the bill can show us why we should make this extraordinary exception I hope he will do so.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the committee considered this as an exceptional case, and one that would not form an ordinary precedent if adopted by this House. Surgeon Owen was left by the proper authorities of the Navy Department in charge of the hospital and naval establishment at Pensacola during this epidemic to which reference is made in the report. He was not supported as he ought to have been by the proper authorities. While there were in this city fifteen or twenty surgeons not performing duty, he was left there single-handed, not only to take charge of the men in the Government employ and the officials connected with the various branches of the service there, but was called upon to go into the city itself and attend those persons who were stricken down with the fever. He had an opportunity to leave the city, but declined. Knowing, as he well did, that he was carrying his life in his hand, yet he declined to leave when the opportunity offered, and the result was that he finally lost his life. He not only gave up his life, but the true, honest woman, his wife, laid down her life also with him, and left these four little waifs to float around in this world with hardly a relative to protect or take care of them. These children are now dependent upon the charity of a very distant relative, who is wholly unable to support them; and although this pension may, in the judgment of the committee, appear excessive, it is no more than is sufficient to raise these children up, educate them, and give them a chance to obtain their own living in the world.

Under all the circumstances the committee believed that it was nothing more than just and right that these young children should be taken care of and become the wards of the nation, at least to the extent it is proposed to do so in the bill submitted for your consideration now.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is it proposed to give $25 a month to each one of these children?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; that is the intent of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Until what age?

Mr. SCOTT. The bill proposes until the age of twenty-one. I shall offer to amend it, however, by making it eighteen.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the condition of this case perhaps as well as any man; but I am also aware of the fact that all over this land there are the orphans of soldiers who laid down their lives in battle and in hospitals and in prisons, and their children have been left as waifs, dependent upon the charity of their neighbors, and yet they have been given but the small sum of $2 a month.

Now, I can not believe that it is right or fair or just to take up these three or four children of this dead officer and make such a glaring exception, giving the comparatively enormous sum of $25 a month.

I can not believe, Mr. Chairman, that this ought to be done. I should be in favor of giving them a reasonable pension, something large in comparison with what we have been giving to the orphans of our soldiers, indeed largely in excess of that, but I am unwilling to give them $25 each per month.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I will offer an amendment, that the children named in this bill be pensioned subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and that all that portion of the bill fixing the rate of pension at $25 per month be stricken out.

Mr. MATSON. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Missouri the bill itself expressly shows that they are already on the roll and receiving the pension the law allows. The pension of a surgeon of the Navy is given to them, and in addition they receive $2 each per month, making, I believe, about $33 per month that they receive now.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Each one?

Mr. MATSON. No; all together. That is to say, they have what the law allows them; just what your proposition would give them.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. That being the case, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to amend this bill by striking out $25 and make it $15 per month.

Mr. LYMAN. I do not understand what the gentleman from Indiana said in reference to what these children are now getting.

Mr. MATSON. I will explain again. Their father was a surgeon in the Navy. As I understand it, the pension of a widow of a surgeon in the Navy is $25 a month. The mother is dead, so that these children get the mother's pension, with the allowance also of $2 a month each, making $8 on this account, which with the surgeon's pension of $25 a month makes $33 to be divided between the four. That is what the law now gives them.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to reduce the amount fixed in the bill to $15 per month each.

The CHAIRMAN. The question will be taken first on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania reducing the age at which this pension shall cease from twenty-one years to eighteen years.

Mr. SCOTT. And also reducing the amount from $25 to $15 per month.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I think, also, that this pension ought to date from the passage of the bill, and I move to amend so that the pension shall begin from the date of the passage of the bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I was about to make this suggestion: that it is possible the gentleman in charge of this bill would have no objection to allowing this pension to stop to these children at the age of sixteen years instead of eighteen, the same age that it stops to each and every other child who is drawing a pension. We certainly can not anticipate that these children will be no more unfit, when they arrive at the age of sixteen, to take care of themselves, or will require any more care at that age, than the children of any other soldier.

Mr. SCOTT. I am willing to accept the amendment making the termination of the pension at the age of sixteen years instead of eighteen.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill as it will stand if amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Albert T. Owen, minor children of the late Surgeon Alfred M. Owen, United States Navy, be, and they are hereby, granted and allowed a pension of $15 each per month, to continue until each child shall respectively attain the age of sixteen years; and the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the names of the said Alfred C. Owen, Christine Q. Owen, Kathleen D. B. Owen, and Albert T. Owen on the pension-roll at the said rates in lieu of the pensions now paid them.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the several amendments proposed, unless a separate vote is demanded.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID M'KINNEY.

Mr. PETERS. I ask by unanimous consent to call up a bill (H. R. 792) granting a pension to David McKinney.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of David McKinney, late a private in Capt. Nathan Boone's company, serving under General Dodge, in the Black Hawk war, and grant him a pension, subject to the pension laws, from the date of the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. SCOTT) was read as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 792) for the relief of David McKinney, submit the following report:

The evidence in this case fully sustains the following points:

(1) That the soldier enlisted for one year in Capt. Nathan Boone's company, United States Mounted Rangers, August 4, 1832, and was discharged August 3, 1833.

(2) That about February, 1833, he was, with others, detailed to make and prepare a crossing over the Arkansas River near Fort Gibson for teams and wagons to cross, and while digging on the south bank of said river was struck on the right foot with a mattock in the hands of a fellow-soldier, who was aiding the work, the mattock cutting through the foot and injuring the same severely.

(3) That said injury has never ceased to trouble him and impair his ability to perform manual labor.

(4) That on August 5, 1879, the soldier filed an application for a pension in the Pension Office, but the same was rejected "on the ground that there is no record of the alleged disability, and claimant can not furnish satisfactory evidence of origin in the service."

In addition to the above the soldier alleges, under oath, that about June 1, 1883, while out from camp with others after meat, he was shot by an Indian through the left leg with an arrow; that he was taken prisoner and held captive for five weeks, and then escaped and joined his company.

The claimant, as reasons for not making an application for a pension sooner, says, under oath, that he was too proud to ask it, and as long as he was able to do anything was content with such living as he could earn, but that now his physical infirmities are such that he feels compelled to ask the aid of the Government in the form of a pension. The soldier is now seventy-three years old.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. PETERS moved that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

DAVID T. ELDERKIN.

Mr. CONGER. I ask by unanimous consent to take up a bill (H. R. 5995) granting a pension to David T. Elderkin.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of David T. Elderkin, late of Company K, One hundredth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. CONGER moved that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

MARGARET COFFEY.

Mr. LOVERING moved, by unanimous consent, to take from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 1108) granting a pension to Margaret Coffee.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. 1108) was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Margaret Coffee, and pay her a pension of $20 per month.

Mr. LOVERING. I move to amend by striking out the letter "e" and inserting the letter "y," so it will read "Coffey" instead of "Coffee" wherever it occurs.

The amendment was agreed to; and, on motion of Mr. LOVERING, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT MONAHAN.

On motion of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 2755) granting a pension to Robert Monahan was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Robert Monahan, late of Company B, Twenty-third Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

On motion of Mr. LA FOLLETTE, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM H. NEVIL.

On motion of Mr. SWOPE, the bill (H. R. 3623) granting a pension to William H. Nevil was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William H. Nevil, late of Company A, One hundred and ninety-eighth Pennsylvania Volunteers.

On motion of Mr. SWOPE, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH LUCE.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 5997) granting a pension to Elizabeth Luce was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth Luce, widow of John W. Luce, late a private in Company E of the First Ohio Light Artillery.

On motion of Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS ALLCOCK.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 1576) granting a pension to Thomas Allcock was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Allcock, late a private in Company F, Third United States Artillery, during the Florida war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month, said pension to be in lieu of that he now receives.

On motion of Mr. BAKER, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALGERNON S. FLAGG.

On motion of Mr. RICE, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 4026) granting a pension to Algernon S. Flagg was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Algernon S. Flagg, late of Company D, Thirty-seventh Massachusetts Volunteers.

On motion of Mr. RICE, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PERNETTA HENDLEY.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 1348) for the relief of Pernetta Hendley was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Pernetta Hendley, widow of Capt. Israel Hendley, who lost his life at the battle of Moroe, in the war with Mexico, in the year 1847; and that the said Pernetta Hendley shall be allowed the same pension from and after the year 1861 as she would have been entitled to receive but for the dropping of her name from the roll.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage.

The amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out these words:

"And that the said Pernetta Hendley shall be allowed the same pension from and after the year 1861 as she would have been entitled to receive but for the dropping of her name from the roll."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to strike out, in line 4, the words "place on," and in lieu thereof insert "restore to;" so it will read "authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll."

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY E. JOHNSON.

On motion of Mr. BUCHANAN, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 4132) for the relief of Mary E. Johnson was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Mrs. Mary E. Johnson, of South Amboy, N. J., widow of John W. Johnson, late a private in Company G, Tenth Regiment of New Jersey Volunteers, the full amount allowed to said John W. Johnson which would have been paid to him but for his death in April, 1885.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary E. Johnson, widow of the said John W. Johnson, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and to pay her such pension as is provided by law to the widow of a private soldier in the late war, and the additional pension for each child of said John W. Johnson and Mary E. Johnson until he or she die or arrive at the age of sixteen years, said child's pension to be at such rate as is allowed by law in similar cases.

Mr. MATSON. I make a point of order against the first paragraph of that bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will state in a few words the occasion for the first paragraph. This is reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. I am aware of that.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The report in this case is a very long one. It appears that in 1863 this woman married a soldier by the name of Daniel M. Rose; that almost immediately after the marriage he deserted her; that in 1867, understanding that he was dead (being informed he had died in hospital), she remarried, her second husband being John W. Johnson. In 1885, on the 17th day of November, John W. Johnson was granted a pension, the certificate of the Pension Office bearing that date. I will read a few words from the report:

By her second marriage the widow became the mother of four children, the oldest born June 21, 1872, and the youngest May 12, 1882. She bears an excellent reputation in the immediate neighborhood in which she lives, and both she and her second husband, who appears to have been a strictly sober, honest, and Christian man, have always been considered most respectable citizens. From the vast quantity of evidence on the subject it clearly appears——

Mr. MATSON. I rise to another point of order. This discussion, I suppose, should relate to the point of order and not to the merits.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There was no point of order stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana made the point of order on the first section of the bill that all after the enacting clause was not in order under the order of the House under which we are now proceeding.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The point of order was not stated, and I supposed it was simply an objection to the matter contained in the bill. It is for the Chair to rule on the point of order, if it is insisted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will cause the special order to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening session private bills granting pensions reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on last Friday the House by its action on bills reported from this committee decided by a vote or votes that claims of this character were not granting pensions within the rule. The Chair feels bound by the decision of the House and sustains the point of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That strikes out the first section.

The CHAIRMAN. It strikes out the first section. The point of order was only to the first section of the bill. If there be no objection the bill with the first section stricken out will be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Some time subsequently,

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I find that striking out the first section of the bill H. R. 4132 leaves the second section as it stands meaningless. I therefore ask unanimous consent to offer the following amendment to the second section.

In line 3, strike out the words "the said" and insert after the name Johnson the words "late a private in Company G, Tenth Regiment of New Jersey Volunteers."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

PARMELIA SMITH.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I call up the bill (H. R. 6092) granting a pension to Parmelia Smith.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Parmelia Smith, the invalid daughter of the late Joseph R. Smith, a brevet brigadier-general in the United States Army, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $25 per month.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, strike out "$25" and insert "$20."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FRANK MANHART.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I call up the bill (H. R. 6130) granting a pension to Frank Manhart.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frank Manhart, late a private in Company A, Second Regiment Missouri Artillery Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LEWIS TYUS.

Mr. TURNER. I call up the bill (H. R. 247) granting a pension to Lewis Tyus.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Lewis Tyns, late a private in Company D, Santa Fé Battalion (mounted), Mexican war, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, at the rate of $40 per month.

The Committee on Pensions recommended the following amendments:

In line 4, strike out "Tyns" and insert "Tyus."
In line 7, strike out "at the rate of $40 per month."

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN H. M'CLELLAND.

Mr. LYMAN. I call up the bill (H. R. 6003) for the relief of John H. McClelland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John H. McClelland, late a soldier in Company B of the Twenty-ninth Regiment Iowa Volunteer Infantry.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SIMON J. FOUGHT.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I call up the bill (H. R. 1902) granting an increase of pension to Simon J. Fought.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an increase of pension to Simon J. Fought, formerly a corporal of Company D of the Forty-sixth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, to $45 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out "$45" and insert "$30."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM F. MILLER.

Mr. PERKINS. I call up the bill (H. R. 4405) for the relief of William F. Miller.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of William F. Miller, late a private in Company B, Sixteenth United States Infantry, and to pay him a pension of $50 per month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out "$50" and insert "$40."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ABEL J. LEWIS.

Mr. WINANS. I call up the bill (H. R. 6381) granting a pension to Abel J. Lewis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and conditions of the pension laws, the name of Abel J. Lewis, late a private in Company F, Twenty-second Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLES E. BOLLES.

Mr. DAVIS. I call up the bill (H. R. 1136) granting a pension to Charles E. Bolles.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Charles E. Bolles, of Vineyard Haven, Mass.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6, add the words "late a seaman in the United States Navy."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER FALKNER.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Ohio. I call up the bill (H. R. 5779) granting a pension to Peter Falkner.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Peter Falkner, late a member of Company C, also of Company D, United States Engineer Battalion.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ISAAC CARLETON.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I call up the bill (H. R. 1889) granting a pension to Isaac Carleton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Isaac Carleton, late of Company E, Fifteenth Regiment Ohio National Guards.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOSEPHINE DA COSTA THOMAS.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 4688) granting a pension to Josephine Da Costa Thomas.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, at the rate of $50 a month, the name of Josephine Da Costa Thomas, widow of Evan Thomas, late of the Fourth Regiment of Artillery, United States Army.

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the report in that case.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. WOLFORD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4688) granting a pension to Josephine Da Costa Thomas, beg leave to report:

That the claimant is the widow of Capt. Evan Thomas, whose military record is as follows:

He was appointed second lieutenant Fourth United States Artillery April 9, 1861; promoted first lieutenant May 14, 1861, and captain August 31, 1864. He received the brevets of captain United States Army December 13, 1862, for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Fredericksburg, Va., and major United States Army July 3, 1863, for gallant and meritorious services at the battle of Gettysburg, Pa.

He served with his company at Fort Monroe, Virginia, from May 1, 1861, to June 14, 1861; on signal duty to December 6, 1861; with battery in Army of the Potomac to June 25, 1862; on sick leave to August 17, 1862; with battery in Army of the Potomac to February 11, 1863; on leave to March, 1863; with battery in Army of the Potomac to July 29, 1863; with Adjutant-General Lorenzo Thomas, engaged in organizing colored troops in Tennessee, Kentucky and Mississippi to May, 1865; at Washington, D. C., to September 1, 1865; with battery at Forts Baker and Whipple, Virginia, to November, 1865, and at Fort Washington, Maryland, to February 9, 1866, and served there with his company to July 20, 1870; on leave to August 26, 1870; with company at Raleigh, N. C., to September 30, 1870; at Fort Monroe, Virginia, to October 24, 1870; at Graham and Lumberton, N. C., to May, 22, 1871; at Shelby and Rutherfordton, N. C., to September 20, 1871; at Charlotte, N. C., to October 13, 1872; en route to and at Presidio of San Francisco, Cal., to January 21, 1873, and in the Modoc campaign until killed, April 26, 1873, in action with Modoc Indians at the lava beds, California; he was in the battles of the Wilderness, Antietam, Chancellorsville, and both battles of Bull Run.

When he was killed he was on a reconnoitering party with sixty-nine soldiers, artillerymen—no cavalry—into the lava beds; was not able to find any of the Modocs until he reached a place where the eruptions of the earth had produced deep caverns in the rock, and where the high cliffs that surrounded them were in the shape of a semi-circle, with large crevices in them, in which the Indians were concealed from sight and protected from the fire of Thomas's command. When he had advanced without molestation or having seen any Indians, he was suddenly fired upon from ambush by a cross-fire and a heavy enfilading fire, where it was impossible to advance and very difficult to retreat. Finding that it was impossible to save his men, he gallantly determined to sell his life and theirs as dearly as he could, calling upon his men, who were panic-stricken, and saying to them, "It is as good a place to die as any—fight and die like men and soldiers," and many other words of encouragement, he fell, covered with blood, and died, emptying his revolver into the advancing Indians.

He was the son of General Lorenzo Thomas; enlisted in the Army when seventeen years old; displayed in the numerous battles he was engaged in great gallantry and coolness. He was a young officer of exceeding great promise, and great hopes were entertained that he would gain the highest eminence of military fame. He leaves the claimant a widow with two children, who are unfortunately very poor and hard run to support themselves.

Your committee report the bill back with an amendment: Strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "forty," and with that amendment report that it ought to pass.

Mr. WINANS. I want to inquire of the gentleman in charge of this bill what pension this widow now receives.

Mr. WOLFORD. Twenty-five dollars a month. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAKER. Can the gentleman from Kentucky inform us whether there is allowance made for her children?

Mr. WOLFORD. No, sir; this pension proposed in this bill is really too little, but it is all the committee would report. [Laughter.]

The committee recommended amending the bill by striking out the word "fifty" before the word "dollars," in line 5, and inserting the word "forty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this bill as amended will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill is like several others that have been sent to the full House for action, and I think it ought to take the same course. It is clearly outside the line of precedents in these cases. Although I am very reluctant to make the motion, I do not see how we can do otherwise than send this bill over to be acted upon by a full House.

I am perfectly willing that that shall be done. I knew this officer during his lifetime, and of course I am very reluctant to seem to offer any opposition to the bill; but fairness to others requires that this bill should take the course I have indicated. I therefore suggest that it be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, that the previous question be ordered upon its engrossment and third reading, and that a vote upon the passage of the bill be taken on Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, it will be remembered that at the last evening session for pension business I objected to the course of carrying over to Monday's session business that ought to be transacted at the Friday evening session. Since last Friday evening I have had occasion to talk to several of the leading members of the House on the subject, and they object, as they have a right to object, to this practice, and I wish to announce now that after this bill is disposed of I shall certainly object to carrying over any other business in that way.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], as the Chair understands, asks unanimous consent that this bill be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, that the previous question be regarded as ordered on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and that a vote be taken on its passage on Monday immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. WOLFORD. I object, Mr. Chairman. If this question can not be settled here we will move a call of the House. We have met here under an order of the House to attend to pension cases. Let every gentleman take his chance. If the members of the House who are absent do not see fit to come here it is their lookout, and we can not afford to send all these cases over and take up the whole of Monday, which should be devoted to other business, in attending to the business that ought to be done at these Friday evening sessions.

Besides, sir, I apprehend that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is laboring under a mistake on this question. There is precedent after precedent for giving a pension of $40 a month to a captain's widow. Again, sir, if the gentleman will look a little at the Army Regulations and consult his own knowledge of military affairs and the facts stated in this report, he will see that this man when killed was not in a captain's command. He was a captain in the artillery, commanding a battery.

But a captain in the artillery is exactly of the same rank as a colonel of infantry. In the artillery you can get no higher than captain and colonel. Anything above that is a brevet command. In the marshaling of the artillery there is always a captain to command a battery, and that is equivalent to the command of a regiment of infantry, so that a captain of artillery is equal in rank to an infantry colonel. I think, sir, that any gentleman who will examine the Adjutant-General's report will see that the case is a meritorious one. This is the beautiful and intelligent young widow of one of the most active, energetic, gallant young officers that history gives an account of. He entered into the service of his country a boy of seventeen. In the very first battle in which he was engaged he so distinguished himself that he received a lieutenant's commission. In the next battle he so distinguished himself that he got a captain's commission. He distinguished himself in battle after battle, until he rose by his gallantry and his bravery and his splendid services to be a major.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] is renewed the Chair will put the motion to the House that this bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass. If there is no objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there is objection.

Mr. NEECE. There is objection.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask that by unanimous consent the vote be taken over again on the amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. WOLFORD. The amendment of the committee reduces the amount of the pension from $50, as proposed originally in the bill, to $40.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to take the vote over again, because I supposed the amendment of the committee had been voted upon and the amount of the pension in that way fixed by a vote of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the bill is still subject to amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. Then I move to amend by striking out "$40" and inserting "$25."

Mr. WOLFORD. If there is to be opposition, I desire to present this case.

Mr. HOLMES. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] what difference there is between this case and the ordinary cases of captains. If it is distinguished in any manner so that an extraordinary pension of $40 or $50 is justified by reason of the peculiar circumstances of the case, we would like to know it.

Mr. WOLFORD. I was about to state the reasons why a pension of $40 a month ought to be granted. If gentlemen want precedents, there have been several cases where captains' widows have been granted pensions of $40 a month on account of the extraordinary services of their husbands.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS] that the Chair had overlooked the fact that the amendment proposed by the committee has already been adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PERKINS. That was the reason I made my suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course that part of the bill which has been inserted by the vote of the Committee of the Whole is not now open to amendment. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PERKINS. In order that this difficulty may be solved, I ask by unanimous consent that we may take the vote over on the amendment recommended by the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELDREDGE. For what purpose does the gentleman wish to do that?

Mr. PERKINS. To see whether we can not agree on some amount which will be satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the vote of the Committee of the Whole adopting the amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions, reducing the sum named in the bill from $50 to $40, may be retaken.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I hope the gentleman will state for what purpose he desires it.

Mr. PERKINS. As I have already suggested, I wish to see whether we can not agree on some amount which will be satisfactory to all of us, thus avoiding the necessity for a call of the House and enabling us to go on with other business.

The CHARMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS]? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The bill is now subject to amendment. The amendment reported by the Committee on Pensions is to strike out "$50" and insert "$40."

Mr. PERKINS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$40" and inserting "$30."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WOLFORD. I hope I may be permitted to state the reasons why the amount of this pension ought to be $40. As I was about to say when I was interrupted, there have been precedents after precedents, commencing in the last Congress and continued in this Congress, for giving to the widows of gallant captains $40 a month where the services of the deceased husbands have been extraordinary. As I was saying, this man rose in battle after battle from grade to grade; and he was engaged in about forty different battles. He received votes of thanks and other recognitions of the services he had rendered to his country. At the time of his death Captain Thomas was commanding a battery. He had been ordered by his superior officer to reconnoiter, there being no cavalry available for the purpose. When he had gone a few miles from the camp into the lava beds he was suddenly surrounded; and, in one of the most desperate fights known to history, he saved his men by sacrificing his own life.

His widow is left destitute. She has two children. There is no provision in the bill for giving these children a pension. The $40 a month must support the widow and the two children. I can not believe that gentlemen, when they understand this case, can be so ungrateful as to refuse proper acknowledgement of the services of a man who in his youth gave his life to his country, who fought all through the late war, was engaged in all the battles of the Wilderness, who gained honor after honor as a gallant officer, and who finally, when in command of a battery, fighting the Modoc Indians, came to an untimely death, leaving a widow and two children penniless.

Now, if this Congress wants to say such gallant conduct as that shall go unrewarded, and these poor orphan children of a man who died under the hands of the Indians for his country and this widow shall not be supported, then let them do so.

I hope the amendment of the committee will prevail, for that is little enough. She ought to have $50 a month, but the committee put it at $40 a month over my vote, because I thought she ought to have $50 and think so yet.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is not the first question on the amendment of the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that the question is first on the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], which is an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOUK. I simply desire to say this: There are many captains' widows drawing much larger pay than is proposed to be given to this lady. Here was an officer sent by a general with whom I was well acquainted, and he was a good man; he was sent when all the evidence shows he was being sent to his slaughter. He was sent and slaughtered in a most savage manner. He leaves a widow and two orphan children; and I want to see the man in this House who will rise up and say that $480 a year is too much to give on the ground of patriotism and every other principle involved in the struggle in which he lost his life. I submit if any member in this House was confined to $480 a year what would become of him? What would become of his wife after he died? Where is the man anywhere in this country if his family were limited to $480 a year which could be respectably supported? I ask every gentleman present to let it go through at $480 a year.

Mr. MATSON. One hundred and two gentlemen said on solemn vote last Monday the widow of Captain Hentig, killed by the Apache Indians, just as Captain Thomas was killed, should not have her pension increased to $30 a month. That was the way the vote went the other day—68 for it, and 102 against it.

I have already said how delicate I feel about this, but it is a question of doing right between these parties. If it is right to increase this widow's pension it is also right to increase the pension of every other captain killed in battle. The House on Monday last voted down, as I have already stated, a like proposition.

Mr. HOUK. It is utterly impossible to make the same rule apply to everybody. Every man's service is different; his conditions are different, and so for the refusal in the gentleman's case there may have been reasons which do not apply in this case. Here there is nothing but the pittance proposed to be given to this widow.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman from Tennessee speaks of the case as my case, but he is mistaken about that, for I voted against it.

Mr. HOUK. I meant the case to which the gentleman referred.

Mr. MATSON. I had not as much interest in that case as I have perhaps in this. I think we should all have an interest in seeing that justice is dealt out to all these parties. If it is right to do this in this case, then there is the same right to do it in all cases where the husband was killed in battle.

Mr. HOUK. We have spent more money to-night than would pay the difference during the whole lifetime of this widow; we have wasted more in the time lost, I mean.

Mr. PETERS. It is not a question of how we feel in reference to individual cases, but it is a question whether this House shall discriminate against those who have already had pensions granted to them heretofore. That is all there is of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 16, noes 14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WOLFORD. I move to amend by making it $35.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on laying aside the bill as amended to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR demanded a vote.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill as amended was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZA A. FISHER.

On motion of Mr. HOUK, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 3152) granting a pension to Eliza A. Fisher, was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Eliza A. Fisher, widow of William H. Fisher, deceased, late a private in Company H, Sixty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

On motion of Mr. HOUK, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HUGH MULHOLLAND.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, by unanimous consent the bill (H. R. 6134) granting a pension to Hugh Mulholland was taken up and read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hugh Mulholland, formerly of Company K, Seventy-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN H. SNYDER.

Mr. PRICE. I ask consent to take up from the Calendar the bill (H. R. 2803) granting a pension to John H. Snyder.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John H. Snyder, late a private in Company C, One hundred and sixth New York Infantry Volunteers.

Mr. WOLFORD. Let us have the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) is as follows:

John H. Snyder enlisted in Company C, One hundred and sixth New York Volunteers, July 23, 1862, and was discharged October 14, 1862, upon surgeon's certificate of disability because of convulsions. On April 18, 1878, he filed an application for pension, alleging chronic diarrhea, contracted in September, 1862.

The first sergeant of the company testifies that in September, 1862, the command was sent out on a scouting expedition in the Alleghany Mountains. While on this scout claimant was taken with the diarrhea, from which he became unfit for duty, and was, by affiant's order, taken to a field hospital at New Creek Station, West Virginia. That affiant saw said claimant frequently at said hospital until his discharge in October following, and knows that he was suffering during that time from chronic diarrhea.

He further testifies that to his personal knowledge claimant suffered from chronic diarrhea after discharge and while living in affiant's neighborhood. There are no medical records of the regiment or records of New Creek hospital on file in the War Department. The assistant surgeon who treated claimant while in the service, as well as Dr. Hand, who rendered treatment from discharge to 1869, are dead, hence the absence of medical evidence covering that period. There is ample testimony, however, showing treatment for the alleged disability from 1869 to the present time, while examination by examining surgeons shows the existence of disability from that cause in a degree of total.

The credibility of the several affiants in the case is not questioned by the Pension Office, but because of the absence of medical evidence prior to 1869 the evidence is not deemed sufficient to warrant the allowance of the claim.

Your committee, however, are of opinion that it is shown beyond any reasonable doubt that claimant, while in the service of the United States, and from exposure incident thereto, contracted chronic diarrhea, and that he has been ever since his discharge, and is now, disabled by reason thereof, so as to entitle him to a pension, and therefore report favorably on the bill and ask that it do pass.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like the committee reporting that bill to let us know the facts on which it is based. I do not care to vote on an opinion; I want facts. They say that they have no doubt but that the disability originated in the service. What are the facts and what the proof on which they base their opinions? I would like some gentleman on the committee or some one who has investigated the case, or the gentleman in charge of the bill, who calls it up, to tell us what it is.

Mr. PRICE. I will endeavor to answer the interrogatories of the gentleman from Kentucky, as far as I can.

I know very little personally of this case. The applicant is a resident of one of the eastern districts of the State; but the Grand Army of the Republic, at a meeting in Milwaukee some two weeks ago, memorialized Congress to pass this old man's claim for a pension. They sent the memorial to me, I introduced the bill, and that is all of the case as far as I know anything about it.

I will say to the gentleman that he is not a brigadier-general, and does not require an increase of pension.

Mr. WOLFORD. There is no evidence that he ever was a soldier at all. There are four years of his life unaccounted for. I do not want to vote on uncertainties.

Mr. BAKER. Do not retaliate.

Mr. WOLFORD. I am not retaliating, but I don't want to vote on a mere statement of the opinion of this committee. However, I shall withdraw my objection, as the gentleman says it is right.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE SCHAEFER.

Mr. NEECE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 413) granting a pension to George Schaefer.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of George Schaefer, late of Company K, Ninety-ninth Illinois Volunteers, now residing in Bushnell, Ill., and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

. The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, in lines 6 and 7, "and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month" and insert "subject to the provisions, limitations, and restrictions of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WALTER A. PHILLIPS.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 3117) granting a pension to Walter A. Phillips.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Walter A. Phillips, late first lieutenant of the Third Battery Light Artillery, Vermont Volunteers.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following amendment:

Strike out, in lines 6 and 7, "the Third Battery Light Artillery, Vermont Volunteers," and insert "Company F, Second Regiment Vermont Volunteers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY HILL.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to call up the bill (H. R. 5085) for the relief of Mary Hill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Mary Hill, a nurse in the Army, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $10 per month.

The committee recommend to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty-five;" so that it will read $25 per month.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like some statement of this case. Let the report be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report (by Mr. SWOPE), as follows:

This claimant, Mrs. Mary E. Hill, was a volunteer nurse (without pay) in the Army of the Potomac from the commencement until the close of the late war, caring for the sick and wounded in hospital, camp, and field, or under direction of the Quartermaster's Department or General Grant, making many journeys from the Army of Virginia to Washington, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, to collect and bring forward large quantities of sanitary supplies for the relief of the sick, wounded, and suffering. This claimant not only devoted her entire time from the opening to the closing of the war in ministering to the relief of the sick, wounded, and dying, but contributed of her own means in purchasing provisions of a character not furnished by the Government, and as an additional sacrifice gave the life of her son, who was killed at the battle of Antietam, and after twenty years she, now aged and broken in health, and destitute of the means of sustenance in her declining years, now asks relief from the Government.

Mr. GALLINGER (interrupting the reading). That is all. I shall not ask for the reading of the rest of the report. I only wanted to ascertain whether she was a volunteer nurse.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

W. C. DAVIS.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask consent to call up the bill (H. R. 6125) granting a pension to W. C. Davis.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is, authorized and directed to place the name of W. C. Davis, late of Company I, First Regiment of West Virginia Veteran Volunteers, in the war of the rebellion, on the pension-roll, subject to the laws and regulations governing pensions in other cases.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE W. STOUT.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. I ask consent to call up House bill No. 1841, granting a pension to George W. Stout.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to place the name of George W. Stout, late a private in Company K, Seventieth Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll, and pay him a pension at the rate of —— dollars per month from and after the passage of this act.

The committee recommended the adoption of the following amendments:

In lines 6 and 7, strike out "and pay him a pension at the rate of —— dollars per month" and insert "subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HANNAH BABB HUTCHINS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to take up the bill (H. R. 3463) granting a pension to Mrs. Hannah Babb Hutchins.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Hannah Babb Hutchins, late an army nurse, and to pay her a pension of twenty-five dollars per month from and after the passage of this act.

The committee recommend the following amendments:

Strike out in the fourth and fifth lines the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws," and in line 7 strike out the words "twenty-five" and insert "twelve."

Mr. WOLFORD. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report (by Mr. HAYNES), as follows:

Mrs. Babb makes the following presentment of her case in petition addressed to Congress:

"The undersigned, Hannah B. Hutchins, a resident of Freeport, in the State of Maine, respectfully represents, that at the time of the breaking out of the civil war she had recently lost her husband and four children; that her name was then Hannah Babb; that in response to the advertisement of the Government for nurses she offered her services in the capacity of a nurse, and on the 1st day of June, 1862, received a dispatch to report immediately at Washington, and that she did so at once; that upon arriving there she signed enlistment papers as a nurse, and mustered into the United States service as a nurse; that she served in that capacity three years and three months in the hospitals in and about Washington, and received pay at the rate of $12 per month and one ration; that she used the money received for pay largely for the purpose of procuring necessary deliecacies for the sick and wounded soldiers; that on the 1st day of January, 1865, while engaged in said service at the Harewood Hospital, in Washington, in passing from ward 12 to ward 10, she slipped on the outside steps and fractured her ribs and injured herself otherwise severely; that she was confined to her quarters for a month, and after partially recovering again commenced services as a nurse; that on the 31st day of July, 1865, she was discharged at that hospital; that she returned to Maine and subsequently married Solomon S. Hutchins, who died in 1880, leaving her a widow with no means of support; that her injury aforesaid affected her so that she was unable to labor and was obliged to be a patient for some eight months in the Maine General Hospital, whereby she got partially relieved, but has never been able to perform any manual labor; that she is seventy-six years of age and entirely without means of support; that she believes she is justly entitled to aid from the nation precisely as if she had been a soldier and been incapacitated from labor by injury received in the line of duty, but that she is informed that there is no law of the nation under which she would be entitled to a pension, as the laws for those purposes do not include nurses. She therefore prays that she may be granted a pension."

In connection with this petition is the following certificate by Josiah H. Drummond, dated December 27, 1885——

Mr. WOLFORD (interrupting the reading). That is enough; I am satisfied.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I have examined this Calendar with some care, and have no objection to the bill now under consideration; but I would be glad to have the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, the gentleman from Indiana, give us some information as to the modus operandi of getting bills reported from his committee. My Congressional district, I think, probably numbers one hundred and seventy-five thousand people, and I have introduced quite a number of bills. I have been in his committee-room once or twice, but I have failed to find there a favorable or adverse report on any bill I have introduced. I would therefore be very glad to know exactly how these reports are made and bills considered, whether according to priority in his committee, or whether each member who introduces bills is expected to go to the committee-room and prepare, or assist in preparing, the reports in case he regards the claim as a worthy one. I would like to know when my constituency is to receive some relief.

Mr. MATSON. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAN-

NON] the bills which he has introduced have all been referred to his colleague from Illinois [Mr. NEECE], a member of the committee. If the gentleman will interview his colleague he will probably ascertain from him all the facts he desires.

Mr. NEECE. I desire to say for the information of my colleague that I do not remember his having called on me. I called on him once and we had some conversation about one of his bills.

Mr. CANNON. Not during this session, I believe. Not that I recollect of.

Mr. NEECE. I spoke to the gentleman, and called his attention to his bills. I will say to the gentleman that there are over one thousand pension bills which have been referred to me as a subcommittee. It is impossible for any one man, or any ten men, I may say, to give all these bills full consideration in their order. I have notified gentlemen whose bills have been referred to me that if they would give me their assistance I would do everything in my power to have their bills considered. It takes time to get papers from the Pension Office, so as to give even one of these bills the fair consideration which I would like to give to every one that I report.

Mr. WOLFORD. I rise to a point of order. I submit that a discussion of this kind is not in order under the rule to-night.

Mr. CANNON addressed the Chair.

Mr. WOLFORD. I insist on my point of order.

Mr. CANNON. I will proceed in order.

Mr. WOLFORD. I deny the gentleman's right to raise a discussion of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Kentucky has withdrawn his point of order?

Mr. WOLFORD. No, sir; I insist on it. I want to have business before the committee on which we can act.

Mr. CANNON. Will the Chair please rule on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky state his point of order?

Mr. WOLFORD. My point of order is that this calling upon the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to know why a bill is not reported is no part of the business of the Committee of the Whole to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will admonish the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] to keep within the rule.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose the gentleman from Illinois will proceed in order; and I only desire to say a single word to my colleague.

Mr. WOLFORD. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that the gentleman from Illinois is proceeding in order. The Chair can not undertake to say beforehand that the remarks the gentleman is about to make will not be in order.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my colleague [Mr. NEECE] that I can readily understand when so many as a thousand bills are referred to him it must be exceedingly difficult for him to consider them all. But I understand the Committee on Invalid Pensions has three or four clerks.

A MEMBER. Three.

Mr. CANNON. All I want is that my bills should be put in the hopper. I will say to the gentleman the mere fact that I had introduced those bills after very considerable investigation might be considered some little evidence that I thought there was something in them at least. I will take an early opportunity to have a further interview with the gentleman, not in Committee of the Whole, touching those bills, for I really want some of them to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments proposed by the committee, which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

Strike out the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

Strike out "$25" and insert "$12."

The amendments were adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN OWENS.

Mr. LOVERING. I call up the bill (H. R. 1117) granting a pension to John Owens.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Owens, late a seaman in the United States Navy.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out the words "a seaman" and insert "an acting ensign."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. ELIZA HUMES.

Mr. HAYNES. I call up the bill (H. R. 6466) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza Humes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Eliza Humes, mother of George W. Humes, deceased, late a private in Company E, Second Maine Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES MORGAN.

Mr. DOCKERY. I call up the bill (H. R. 4824) granting an increase of pension to James Morgan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to grant an increase of pension to James Morgan, late of Company C, Fourteenth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers, and to pay him $40 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 6, strike out "$40" and insert "$25."

Mr. WOLFORD. Let the report in that case be read.

Mr. PERKINS. Perhaps I can state what will satisfy the gentleman in less time than would be occupied by the reading of the report. I know personally this soldier, and I know he is blind in one eye.

Mr. WOLFORD. I withdraw the call for the reading of the report.

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALEXANDER FORSYTH.

Mr. PETERS. I call up the bill (H. R. 3946) to increase the pension of Alexander Forsyth.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to increase the pension of Alexander Forsyth, late of Company K, Eleventh Wisconsin Volunteers, to $30 a month.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the following amendment:

In line 5, strike out "$30" and insert "$20."

The amendment was adopted.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HARRISON W. MOORE.

Mr. WINANS. Mr. Chairman, I call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 6339) for the relief of Harrison W. Moore.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That Harrison W. Moore, late a private in Company A, First Regiment of Wisconsin Cavalry Volunteers, in the service of the United States during the late war, be placed on the pension-roll of the United States at the rate of $20 per month, for injuries received and disease contracted in action and in said service during his enlistment, said pension to date from the time of his discharge.

The committee recommended the amending of the bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, instructed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Harrison W. Moore, late a private in Company A, First Regiment Wisconsin Cavalry.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SOPHIA F. BIXBY.

Mr. RICE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 4027) granting a pension to Sophia F. Bixby.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sophia F. Bixby, mother of George A. Bixby, late of Company H, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CHARLOTTE BUCK.

Mr. ELLSBERRY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 3614) granting a pension to Charlotte Buck.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Charlotte Buck, dependent stepmother of James Buck, deceased, late of Company A, Sixteenth United States Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration bills upon the the Private Calendar, under the special order of the House, and had instructed him to report sundry bills with various recommendations.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 27, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask unanimous consent that the prayer made by the Chaplain this morning may be published in the RECORD.

Mr. JAMES. I object.

SUITS AGAINST COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, with accompanying papers, in regard to suits against collectors of customs now pending in the United States court for the southern district of New York for duties claimed to have been illegally exacted; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PINDAR, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. STRUBLE, for ten days, on account of important business.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. NEECE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 81) granting a pension to Margaret B. Harwood; and

A bill (H. R. 1557) for the relief of David W. Jones.

SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. JAMES. I desire to call up the special order, House bill 5690, for the free coinage of silver—the bill reported adversely from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

The SPEAKER. On this bill the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAND. Before the gentleman from Texas proceeds, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD certain statistics showing imports and exports of gold and silver to and from certain countries for a series of years, and showing also the stock of gold and silver in the principal countries of the world.

There being no objection, leave was granted.

The following are the statistics referred to:

Mr. CULBERSON addressed the House. [See Appendix.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I do not presume to undertake, nor do I count myself equal to, an elaborate discussion of the silver question. I desire at this time to touch on only two or three points.

Let us admit at once that we are all bimetallists in the sense of desiring to retain both gold and silver as bases for the currency of the country, and that we do not propose to demonetize either, even if we stop the coinage of one of them. Let us admit that our immense territory, population, business, and commercial interests require the service of both metals, and that to abandon either would be a source of contraction and disaster.

It is not for me to say that I know this would be the result of a monometallism of either. The function of money is to serve as a standard of value and as a medium of exchange. As a standard of value there is certainly enough of gold alone to fulfill that function, and would be if the amount of gold coined were far less than it is. As a medium of exchange, so utterly have the modern means of communication reduced our whole system of exchange and financial settlement of balances the world over that it has been said that one gold dollar now does the work that formerly was done by a thousand gold dollars, just as in the clearing-house the mutual debts and credits of a hundred banks are settled by a stroke of the pen and the payment of a comparative trifle. Indeed, so little use is there for coin—either gold or silver—that it scarcely appears in the ordinary transactions of life. I doubt if one man in a thousand sees during the year a single gold piece or more than five silver dollars at any one time. But as a basis or security for our financial system, no less efficient and potent because lying out of sight like the foundations of a house, there must undoubtedly be a sufficiently large coin reserve to make stable the superstructure of the credit of the national currency. While, therefore, by no means certain, as I have suggested, that gold might not, as practically now for years it has done, perform the mere functions of a sole and sufficient metal standard of our coinage, I appreciate the argument in favor of the service of both gold and silver.

But for that very reason I can not understand why gentlemen who oppose the demonetization of silver should not also oppose a policy which may demonetize gold by driving it out of circulation, even if not out of the country, and thereby induce that very reduction to substantially one-half of the currency basis of the country which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] anticipates—without good reason, I think—as the result of abandoning silver, and which he regards with such a terror of its shrinking effect upon all values and its doubling effect upon all debts. He must remember that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander; and that if a monometallism of gold is fraught with such terrible consequences to the mass of the people simply because the other or silver half of their present money supply would be gone, a monometallism of silver would be just as bad, because then the gold half would be gone.

In the interest of bimetallism, which these gentlemen favor, as do I, and in the interest of the largest basis for our currency—a basis commensurate with our immensely expanding national interests—I am therefore opposed to the continuance of the present policy of a coinage of silver, indefinite and unlimited in time and therefore in amount, which unless we check or set some limit to it, will as surely excurrencise or expatriate gold as the sun will rise to-morrow. Amid all the rush and excursions of this debate, the simple practical question still recurs, not asking for rhetoric but for a plain answer—how, if you really propose to keep up the double standard of gold and silver, are you going to preserve that substantial parity between them which is the sole condition of maintaining them as such a double standard? You propose nothing to that end. You do not even suggest the honest measure of increasing the weight of your silver dollar. On the contrary, you propose only to pile the agony still higher by authorizing free coinage, thus not only making the disparity still greater but actually inviting the whole world to dump into our mints its entire stock of silver—bullion, coins, old teapots, spoons, and tankards—and to draw back for every 78 cents' worth so dumped a full United States dollar. That would be a very pretty profit of 22 per cent. for those who have silver to sell, but a very gross imposition on the people at large who would be taxed to pay it.

If you really mean to get rid of gold and put the country upon the monometallism of silver, say so. But do not clamor for bimetallism at the very moment you are making bimetallism impossible—at the very moment you are insisting upon the continuance of a policy which takes no account of the glaring fact that under it gold and silver are now 22 per cent. apart, that day by day their disparity is enlarging, and that thus you are making absolutely certain the retirement at some time of the better metal and the repetition of that very agony of a depreciated currency which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] so forcibly pictured. He referred to and admitted the "financial ruin" which a few years ago threatened the country "because of the sinking value of money," and to the "wise statesmanship" through which "we gradually but surely came back to stable money and returning prosperity." And yet he now argues in favor of a depreciated and necessarily soon to be exclusive silver money of similar "sinking value," as if like causes in one case would not produce like effects in another.

You say that to stop the coinage of silver will destroy one of the markets for it and thus reduce its value still more. But its present fall is largely due to its demonetization by Germany and France, and if by suspension of its coinage or by assuring suspension at a fixed date you can drive these countries to an international arrangement you will take the best step toward stopping its depreciation as money. Down to 1874 the European bimetallic union kept a par at Paris of about 15½ to 1. Then by law these European mints were closed to silver, and hence its emaciation there and here. Compel a reversal of that international policy and you will quickest restore the equilibrium. That done, and then you can maintain a bimetallic gold and silver standard—and I very greatly doubt whether as a basis of currency you can expel either of these metals without a contraction or, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] calls it, a constriction of values that would be ruinous—you can then, I say, maintain a bimetallic gold or silver standard permanently, which is the very thing we want to do; and you can do it in no other way. As has been sententiously said, "There is no Monroe doctrine in silver."

It is true that up to this time, by artificial means, by legislative enactment, by administrative good management, by the good fortune of trade, we have succeeded in keeping both metals at an artificial par. In other words, we have stood the strain alone up to the present time, and can possibly stand it even a little further. But because you can bend a bow into a half-circle it does not follow that you can bend it into a whole one. When the crash comes it will come like the tumble of an avalanche. When you have strained this increasing disparity just one hair too much, when you have laid the last straw on the camel's back, you will see the two metals part company; one of them disappearing and all values turning to the lower standard of the other, as the mists fly at one sun stroke from the hill-tops. It is a contradiction in terms and in fact—it is flying in the face of common sense—this pretense of a common double standard of gold and silver, and of maintaining bimetallism, when in our international commercial world one is worth only three-quarters as much as the other. You might as well insist on two yard-sticks, one of 36 and the other of 27 inches. If the great commercial nations will all unite, this artificial parity can undoubtedly be kept up, but otherwise it is inevitable that the farce must play out in time—and all the quicker if each day you are taking one more inch off the shorter yard-stick. We are told that under our present policy gold is accumulating instead of diminishing, and that therefore such fears are unfounded. Once upon a time a certain frog, whose vanity has made his story immortal, began to swell. I doubt not some prudent observer suggested to him that the ultimate result of that process would be an explosion. I doubt not also that the frog replied by pointing to his fair enlargement and plumper figure—but the result was none the less that he burst, and the places that knew him knew him no more.

It is true that the supply of gold has accumulated. Two causes have contributed to this: First, the balance of trade has been in our favor, and when it shall be against us the same cause will operate the other way. The second is that the very policy of recent administrations in paying our public obligations in gold or by the gold standard—a policy which is now so severely and so inconsistently criticised by the advocates of the present silver coinage—has itself maintained the absolute and unwavering credit of our currency, prevented alarm and distrust, and thereby preserved the par value of every dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, that bore the stamp of the Government, and so saved us from a drain upon our gold balance, and perhaps a financial panic. It is now proposed to destroy that credit, to break this great and otherwise impregnable barrier against the operation of the Gresham law by reversing that policy and by paying the public obligation in the cheaper coin, thereby proclaiming to the whole world that the United States, relying on its technical right, has lowered its standard of financial obligation.

Let the Secretary of the Treasury begin to-morrow to pay the national creditors in silver, or by the silver standard—let it be understood that that is to be the policy hereafter—let the next installment of the public debt and interest be met in that coin, and forthwith, in the twinkling of an eye, as everybody knows, gold will mount to a premium, the Gresham law will begin to operate, because the barriers against it will have been broken down, we shall be upon the ground of the monometallism of silver, bimetallism will cease to be our policy, and fortunate shall we be if panic and disaster do not follow.

It may be admitted that if two-thirds of all the gold in the world were to perish by some convulsion of nature, the value of gold would at once appreciate so monstrously that we should all recognize that, if there were a right of option of payment in gold or silver, we might no longer be bound to pay in the former metal. So, on the other hand, if by some unlocking of the bowels of the earth silver were to become at once as abundant as tin, I do not believe that even the chairman of the Coinage Committee would insist longer on his favorite metal. But we are met and are likely to be met by no such extremity. Gold and silver are still the money metals, varying somewhat in their relative value, but both adapted better than anything else to constitute elements of a common currency basis. The difference in their value is such, just at this time, that if, by continued coinage of silver and the absence of international agreement, we let that enlarging difference go on, gold will be excurrencised or expatriated, silver left alone, and our country, with its proud financial record, taken from the list of the first-rate financial nations of the world, with whom our commercial and business relations, affecting the trade, industries, and welfare of our sixty millions of people, should be on a par, and reduced to a second-rate financial place with Mexico.

Suppose we admit that gold may be appreciating as silver is depreciating, or rather that both are going apart. Even if this be true, even if gold is appreciating, one of the very reasons for this result is that the apprehension of a continuance of our present policy of an excessive silver coinage, together with the apprehension that we are going to pay our obligations in a cheaper metal—these very apprehensions by an accelerating ratio are inspiring alarm, are weakening the value of silver, and are giving an artificial and exceptional value to gold, making everybody anxious to secure and hoard it, and therefore still more appreciating it. Hence that very striking statement made the other day by the gentlemen from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY] that savings-banks and trust companies are already hoarding $30,000,000 in gold, and steadily increasing the hoard. It is not a question whether they can continue to do this or whether their own interest will not compel them to turn their hoard into investment. It is the impulse to hoard at all, the start of apprehension, which is significant and like a weathervane shows at once which way the wind blows. Hence also the rumor that our capitalists are withdrawing their funds from American enterprise and investing them abroad. Criticise the administration for paying the debt and interest by the gold standard! Were it to do otherwise it would be the beginning of a run on every depository of that precious metal. Violation of law! The administration is guilty of no violation of law. The payment of our bonds in gold or silver, so far as requirement of payment in either is concerned, is left, on any fair interpretation of the statute, to the executive department. It has been ingeniously suggested, in support of the executive policy, that, at the time the law referred to was passed, gold meant gold dollars and silver meant only subsidiary coins, or, if it meant silver dollars, then only silver dollars up to the extent of their then limited legal-tender value of $5; in other words, the term "gold and silver" meant "no other than such 'gold and silver' as the Government then had in the Treasury and was then coining."

Practically, however, the mere material of payment is of small account. The public interest is usually paid in checks, and in the book-keeping settlement of balances. Any claimant can have silver or paper if he prefers. The choice of the metal is significant not as to the substance of the thing paid over the counter, but as to the standard of the payment; and that standard should be gold, because gold is the standard of all the great commercial countries with which we are allied, the standard popularly recognized when the pledge of payment was made, the standard which by our own statutes is made "the unit of value," the standard of the business of our country now for years, and especially the standard in which labor, the great creditor of the Republic, is entitled to be paid—not to be paid necessarily in the heavy mass of its coin but in its always stable equivalent. Beware, then, how you drive that standard out.

The simple, common-sense thing to do now is to call a halt. We have an abundance of silver—more, evidently, than with all the efforts which the administration says it has made we can force into circulation. Aside from the natural self-interest of those who have it to sell there is no exigency that clamors for its further accumulation in the form of coin, though it is not unlikely, and I am hopeful that some plan may be devised—possibly that suggested by Senator SHERMAN—for its use in uncoined bullion or otherwise as a basis for that increasing currency circulation which, of course, our rapidly growing population and business require, but which, if regulated by the double standard, as I trust it may be possible to have it regulated, must not operate to split that double standard into two widely unequal standards.

Give silver coinage, then, at least a present or prospective rest. Do not demonetize silver and do not take away its legal-tender function; but suspend at some time its coinage, the unlimited continuance of which is one of the very causes of the appreciation of gold, and therefore, as I have said, to some extent, of the present disparity between the two metals. In the interest, therefore, of bimetallism, in the interest of silver itself, it is time to cast an anchor and take our bearings; to suspend, or at least fix a time for the suspension of, silver coinage, whether it be in two or three years; and then to see—for that is perhaps all we can now do—if some international arrangement with the other great commercial countries can not then be made.

The only other point I care to make is as to the relation of this question to the interests of what are called the debtor classes. I agree that it is not the capitalists, not the bankers, not the money powers whose interests should be preferred, but those of the body of the people, the men who toil and whose labor is the most sacred trust confided to the care of the Government. Indeed, I am inclined to think that nothing has been exaggerated more in this whole discussion than the attitude of capital. My observation is that it is not half so eager or aggressive in this whole public debate throughout the country as has been represented. My experience and yours is that it takes care of itself under whatever circumstances. Come gold or silver, come high rates or low rates, came boom or panic, come inflation or contraction, it eludes danger and improves opportunity. It is selfish, Argus-eyed, potential; and from a look over my own section of the country I am persuaded it is already discounting the future and is unalarmed, if not indifferent, at any action Congress now seems likely to take.

I mean of course not that capital which is a trust for the widow and orphan, but that capital which is so especially obnoxious to-day to public sentiment and which is the selfish equipment of the plutocracy. In homely phrase, that form of capital can stand the agony of a debased coinage if the other great interests of the people can do so; nay, would probably profit by the convulsions of which it would take advantage. I have no sympathy with it except as it serves by its use and its employment to keep the blood flowing in our channels of industry. My sympathies, like those claimed by my friends on the other side, are with those who have not this plutocratic reliance, and whose labor, whose earnings, whose credit, whose homes depend upon the financial standard and regulation which our legislation shall give to currency and the monetary system.

On that premise, what then is the best policy as between silver and gold in their present disparity of value as to the matter of a national standard? I can only gather my illustrations from homely life. I have been taught, and I know it is true, and no honest laboring man in my district would instruct me otherwise, that if a workman dependent on his hands for his living desires success, reputation, property, credit, he will obtain them by turning out the best work and not by turning out in bare compliance with the letter of his contract second-rate work. The latter would give him perhaps an immediate gain in a single transaction or in fulfilling an existing obligation, but it would forever ruin him in all future negotiations and stamp him as a second rate.

Just as true is this principle in our national as in our individual relations. Admit, if you please, that Government is at liberty to pay in silver or in gold. Admit that the silver dollar is not a dishonest dollar and that it is hardly worth while, even in the eagerness of debate, to term it repudiatory. But, on the other hand, you must admit that it has fallen off in relative value, and that, as compared with gold, it is like the artisan's second-rate work as compared with his best. To pay our national debt in silver, the cheaper coin, and by thereby driving gold out of the country to scale all private indebtedness, might be a gain in that single transaction, but it would be an infinite injury to public and to private credit and therefore a source of burden and disaster and hard times not to the nation merely, which can stand almost anything, but to that very body of the laboring and debtor people who can stand very little, and for whom you are pretending to legislate and whose interest you claim to have at heart.

It is said, why pay the bondholder in gold and everybody else in silver? A false impression is produced by these constant references to the bondholder, as well as by the whole foolishness of calling names and invoking rhetorical bugbears. Whether it be silver-kings on the one side or gold-bugs on the other, we may be pretty sure that one is just as selfish as and not a bit more interested in the "dear people" than the other. The bondholder is no worse and no better than anybody else. Taking into account the high premium cost of his United States bonds, and the small rate of interest they pay, there is no other equally secured investor who gets so small a return for his money. Remember, too, that he by no means stands for the plutocracy, but represents many a poor widow and orphan, many a hard-working laborer, many a dependent salary clerk, all whose savings are invested in the securities of the United States, either directly or through the savings-bank or some other financial institution. There is, of course, no reason why the bondholder should be paid in any better coin than any other creditor of the Government. But the advantage of paying our national debt and interest in gold or by the gold standard is not because it is held by the bondholder class as such, but because the coin in which or standard by which we pay the national debt and interest is the one test that determines the credit of our Government throughout the world, and thereby establishes the standard and test also of public and private credit and, most important of all, the worth of the people's money. Like any other humble laborer, working for the Government for my daily wages, I might ask why I should be paid in silver while the bondholder is paid in gold. But a moment's reflection shows me that it makes no difference to me so long as my silver, by virtue of the Government's resolute and honest policy, is just as good as the bondholder's gold. But, on the other hand, if the Government, by paying the bondholder in silver, thereby impairs and discredits all its currency and its credit, and drives gold to a premium and so out of circulation, then it does make a difference to me and a very damaging difference; for then the silver in which I am paid becomes of less purchasing power; I have killed the goose that laid the golden egg; I am become the dog in the manger; in my endeavor to bite off the bondholder's golden nose I have bitten off my own silver one, which till then was just as good as his, and had it been a rose would have been just as sweet called by whatever metallic name.

The laboring man is not a fool or a weakling. He knows perfectly well on which side his bread is buttered, is a good deal brighter than a silver dollar, and has organized for his interest and for that share in the benefits of the wealth he creates to which he is so justly entitled. You can not in the long run cheat him with sophistries. He is the one constant creditor. His pecuniary interest is represented by his wages and his savings. These, to him, are sacred; and anything that impairs them is his enemy and ruin. He rarely owes anything, except for his daily supplies, which are less than his daily wages. On the contrary, generally thrifty, he has his balance in savings laid up for a wet day. In Massachusetts there are in its savings-banks $274,000,000, almost equal to one-quarter of our national debt. It is an increase of twelve millions in the last year, and represents in round numbers 850,000 open accounts, a number equal to 40 per cent. of all the inhabitants of that State, and more than 100 per cent. of all the families, with an average sum to each depositor of over $300. It is the adventurous capitalist, the blood-sucking speculator, the gambler in property, the borrower on risks and chances, the would-be monopolist, the wrecker in mining ventures and land schemes and paper-and-water railroads, in other words it is the very vultures against whom to-day organized labor is most protesting, that constitute to a large extent that part of the debtor class for whom and in aid of whose reckless ventures you are really depreciating the currency. Suppose we invoke just here some of the epithets of our friends on the other side. Suppose we throw back a little mud—in a purely Pickwickian sense, of course—at these silver cormorants who conspire in the interest of these outrageous schemes, these bloated fatteners who feed on the rotting carcass of a debased currency, these vampires who eat out the hearts of women and orphans and the poor, and rob them of the security of their little savings, wrung out of the toil and sweat of days' works and worn muscles. The ghosts of Nero and Tamerlane and Phillip II have been invoked, but what are they, or what is the obliteration of Poland or the oppression and robbing of Ireland compared with this crime of clipping the coin and reducing the value of the wages of fifty million of people, and then coupling with the crime the unutterable meanness of pretending to do it under the guise of protecting them? So the wolf covers and devours the lamb. For Heaven's sake let us get out of this sickening air of bathotic and vaporous hyper-rhetoric and unjust charges against parties who are just as honest and just as selfish on one side as on the other. The people only laugh at this bandying of epithets. They know that the various material interests of the country will naturally seek their own promotion; that the owners of silver investments very naturally pull one way to secure the sale and profit of their product, and the security holders, who are the wage-earners and wage-savers, pull the other to prevent the depreciation of their property. But there is no need to call names or throw mud. The simple question is whether on the whole and for the general welfare, as distinguished from any private or local interest, it is better to maintain the standard of the people's money or to debase it. Certainly the laboring man wants no depreciation in the purchasing power of the wages he earns or in the security of the savings he has laid by out of them. Yet to pay him in a baser coin is to diminish the purchasing power of every dollar for which he sweats and toils and for which he gives his blood and bone. You can not in the long run deceive him by bellowing that you have clipped the bondholder's coin, if, at the same time, he sees that you in the same ratio have reduced his own coin and impaired his ability to buy flour and meat and lay up savings. He cares not whether you pay the bondholders by the standard of gold or diamonds so long as you pay him in an equivalent thereto. Beware how you trifle with his dollar, for, let it be gold or silver or paper, the moment it is worth to him less than a hundred cents and will purchase for him less than a hundred cents' worth of bread and meat he will justly turn and rend you. He owes no debts and is under no temptation to scale them. It is capital, enterprise, employment which owe debts, and which owe him and not he them—and when they pay him he wants the best money, and if you give him anything less he will justly charge that he asks for bread and you give him a stone, for fish and you give him a serpent. I envy not the estimate in which he will hold the legislator or body of legislators who shall set in motion the avalanche of a depreciation of the currency of the laboring masses, clipping their wages, undermining the foundation of their profits, credit, and accumulation, and reducing the purchasing power of their dollars. What is its purchasing power under the present gold standard, as compared with its purchasing power when we had an inflated and depreciated currency? It will be the part of prudence to look at the statistics on this point, for they show that when in the inflated period during and after the closing years of the war wages were more in the number of dollars paid than they are now under a gold standard, yet their purchasing power, their equivalent in the necessary supplies of life, was less.

Mr. Joseph H. Walker, an eminent economist, has prepared most interesting and valuable tables on this point, which I annex to my remarks. As he says: "Advocates of cheap money claim that such measures will benefit the man in moderate circumstances and particularly the wage-worker. The exact contrary is the fact, as the following tables will show. While wages slowly increased from 1861 in the number of dollars paid the workman, their purchasing power—the real value of his wages measured by what they would buy—just as surely decreased." For instance, as he shows, "dyers, who received 67 cents a day in 1860 and $1 in 1864, could only buy with their dollar in 1864 what they could buy with 50 cents in 1860. Their real wages, therefore, in 1864 were one-quarter less than in 1860," while nominally a third more. And to-day, in this gold year 1886, "they are receiving one-third more than in 1860," to wit, "one dollar in a gold currency," which will buy twice as much as one dollar would in 1864 under an inflated currency. And so on through all the other occupations, as his tables show.

Give labor, then, a sound currency, so that it shall be insured the payment of its credits in the best money—money as good and of as great purchasing power as that of the most favored creditor class. Then move on to the justice of its next great demand for a fairer distribution of the benefits of the wealth it creates and to the appreciation and enjoyment of which our splendid free national system, with its institutions of education and equality, is constantly entitling it; then attack and solve in its interest this paradox of economics under which to-day an excess of good times is, for the masses, hard times—in other words, cheapness and abundance of production of the good things of material comfort, and yet no thoroughfare to their corresponding abundant use and enjoyment by the masses whose industrial hands are piling them up in your granaries and storehouses or in the gambling "corners" of your speculators.

And not only the interests of labor but the interest of public and private credit. Talk of gold and silver and greenbacks and bank notes! Vast as is the volume of all these it is nothing compared with the real currency of our country, which is credit—a currency that rests on no metal, but on the infinitely more precious ore of human faith and trust. You can strike no blow at gold or silver that will in any event work the ruin that would come from striking a blow at public and private credit. In the interest of the savings of the laboring poor, in the interest of labor when it borrows to invest in the security of a home, in the interest of those great enterprises based on credit in which labor finds its employment and daily food, I therefore plead, not for any question of technically honest compliance with the letter of a statute while avoiding its spirit, but for those foundations of financial public and private faith and credit, compared with which the difference between paying in gold and silver is as mole hill to a mountain.

Again I plead for the interest of the honest and deserving debtor class as distinguished from the gambling debtor class. There are three classes of debts. First, those which are outstanding. I admit these would be more easily paid in baser coin. But remember that the very apprehension of their being so paid would at once tend to call them in and to insure their discharge and thereby their renewal or replacement at not only more exacting and heavier rates but at rates and under conditions which would compensate for the very loss sustained by the creditor in taking and in being liable hereafter to take payment in baser coin. Already lenders are writing the notes they take "payable in gold."

Second. Those debts, which are hardly debts at all, but are the daily and immediate exchange of labor, or whatever form of production, for its price—the day's work or commodities of to-day—done or delivered and paid for to-night. These would not be much affected either way by the question of the character of the coin of payment. If that were more valuable, less would be paid; if less valuable, more would be paid. The thing would regulate itself, except that history teaches that in all changes from a more precious to a cheaper currency labor is the last thing that gets the corresponding rise in its price and the first to get the corresponding fall.

Third. Those debts which are obligations incurred at the present time for future redemption, and to which you must add all those debts of the first class which would be at once called in for renewal or replacement. This class overshadows all the rest because it at once embraces the whole vast field which I have already referred to as covered by the term credit. It includes not only the mortgage, by the operation of which the laborer hopes to capitalize his savings in the form of a home, but also the great enterprises, which people our Territories, build public works, run factories, develop mines, employ our vast resources and accumulations of labor, and are identical with the prosperity and growth of our country. Beware, you of the South and Southwest, how you repel rather than invite capital and its investment. Let it be understood that payments are to be made in a baser coin, let it be understood that such is hereafter to be our national policy, not only as to silver, but as to any other resort that can be had for scaling a debt, and you have not aided the enterprise that will develop the waste land and employ those who labor; you have made not soft but hard for the honest debtor classes—not at first, but with an increasing severity and ultimate disaster—the path they must tread. You have weakened credit, raised rates of interest, added burdens to the back of toil, and closed to it the easier avenues to accommodation.

For Heaven's sake, have we learned nothing from our financial history since the war? Where would your honest debtor classes, your labor, your industrial enterprises, that have made the Republic a glad song of triumph, have been if ten or fifteen years ago we had said it would be easier to pay our debts in paper worth fifty or twenty cents on the dollar, and had pursued the bubble inflation till it burst? Was it nothing that, under Republican auspices, not contenting ourselves with any technical letter-compliance, we rose to the height of the honest workman's standard of giving his best work, and announced to the world that, whatever be its best currency or coin, in that the American nation and the American people pay their public and private debts, as Massachusetts did during the war, and thereby lightened the burden on the shoulders of her patriotic people? Have we seen no results in the reduction of the rates of interest on our national bonds, placing them at 3 or 3½ per cent., and so lightening the public burden?

I appeal to the victorious majority of this House, flushed with success and now entering on full administration of the Government. Is this the Democratic standard, this the first act of the Democracy now regaining full national control, that it strikes its first blow at public and private credit, that it refuses to sustain its own Executive in keeping the financial flag at the masthead, and that it announces to the world that Democratic supremacy and leadership are only another name for impaired credit, for half-mast financial standards, and for transferring the Republic from its financial rank among the foremost nations of the earth to that of India and the "heathen Chinee?" [Prolonged applause on both sides of the House.]

The following is an extract from Mr. Joseph H. Walker's "Address on the perils of wage-workers in continued silver coinage," which I ask leave to have printed herewith:

In all departures from a sound currency, such as our country made, the suffering and loss of the wage-workers are many fold more than of any other class.

Advocates of cheap money always claim that such measures will benefit the man in moderate circumstances, and particularly the wage-worker.

The exact contrary is the fact, as the following tables show. While wages slowly increased from 1861 in the number of dollars paid the workmen, their purchasing power—the real value of their wages measured by what they would buy—just as surely decreased. In making up these tables only the staple articles used by a family are enumerated, but the fluctuations on articles not named were even greater. In making them I have taken wholesale prices for each article, and those of the same grade each year, and made the same additions to them for the retail price through all the years, so that, whether correct or not as to actual prices, they are absolutely correct as to proportions and fluctuations. Furthermore, I have examined many price-currents, and have secured many retail prices of dealers, all of which confirm my figures.

That no one might say a family of four persons could live on a less sum than is stated, I have made the supplies for a family of four persons just above the freezing and starving point.

Man only ascends in the scale of humanity as he has a sum to expend on himself and his family above the necessities of a bare existence, and in proportion to that sum, providing he spend it wisely, does he rise in the scale of manhood.

"Allow not Nature more than Nature needs, Man's life is cheap as beast's."

No man will claim that any family ought to be compelled to live at as low a rate as is indicated in the tables given. By comparing his wages in paper dollars with the prices of staple things which he must buy to live, is the value to the wage-worker of the legal-tender dollar during the suspension of specie payments accurately shown.

It is not true that more wages were accumulated during the inflation period. The deposits of savings-banks and every other known fact show the contrary to be true. I have taken as normal prices those of 1860.

It will be seen that the prices of 1885 are slightly below those of 1860, and nearly the same as those of 1859. While many object to the statement that "the premium on gold shows the value of wages," no one can successfully contradict the results shown, when the currency wages the laborer received and the currency price he paid are used in finding the real value of his wages.

The purchasing value of the wages paid in any given year is found by multiplying the wages paid that year by the cost of the necessaries of life at the normal prices of the year 1860, namely, $225, and dividing the product by what the same things actually cost him in the year he received the wages used in the calculation. The wages of a dyer in 1860 were 67 cents a day; total cost of food and supplies, $225. His wages in 1864 were $1 a day; total cost of the same food and supplies, $441.67; i. e., $1 multiplied by $225 is $225, which divided by $441.67 gives 50 cents, which was the purchasing value of his $1 of 1864.

The wages of every class the country over show substantially the same thing. By the tests of the wages paid and the prices paid for supplies on the same date (in the table) it will be seen that dyers in woolen factories, who received 67 cents a day in 1860 and $1 in 1864, could only buy with their dollar in 1864 what they could buy with 50 cents in 1860.

Their real wages therefore in 1864 were one-quarter less than in 1860.

It was four years before their wages were worth to them as much as in 1860, namely, in 1865, when their wages were $1.20, and would buy what 68 cents would buy in 1860. During this time their real wages averaged 53.9 cents a day, and they lost the value of 189½ days' wages, $126.90. To-day they are receiving one-third more than in 1860, $1 in a gold currency, which will buy as much as the same nominal sum would in 1860.

Says J. E. Therold Rogers in Work and Wages:

"When prices of the necessaries of life rise wages do not rise with them. No crime against labor is more injurious than expedients adopted on the part of government which tends to raise prices."

There is not an economist in any country who does not declare that his investigations confirm this statement of Mr. Rogers.

The experiment of depreciating the currency was never tried in any country under circumstances more favorable to the wage-worker than here. A war was in progress during four years of the time, of such vast proportions that the consumption of the aggregate products of labor was increased by fully one-tenth, besides which more than one-tenth of the men who competed with each other in the labor market were employed in military operations, which was the equivalent of increasing the market for the laborer by one-fourth. Under these apparently favorable conditions for the wage-worker the value of his wages to him ought to have materially increased, instead of depreciating, if it is possible for him ever to save himself from loss in periods of a debased currency. If under such conditions he lost the value of one and one-tenth years' wages, in a period of about six years, how can Mr. BECK believe that the "toiling millions" will be benefited by the unlimited coinage of 412½ grains of silver into a legal-tender dollar, depreciating the currency 20 per cent. or more?

Scarcely a day's wages were lost up to 1873, when the inflation of business collapsed. Work was pressing in all departments everywhere, but at a loss in real wages to the employed to the vast amount named. Subsequently the purchasing value of wages improved, and has continued to do so up to the present time; but work has fallen off, and a large portion of the time they have had to submit to enforced idleness.

Since 1873 strikes, lockouts, and riots have been many, and the wage-workers, as a whole, have not been able to reap the full value of their higher wages.

Mr. BECK would plunge them into another era of loss and suffering by again depreciating the currency. Even he can not have forgotten the Pittsburg riots and the loss of millions, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad riots, and the disorganized condition of industries all over the country, during the last dozen years, all caused by the inevitable struggle to get back to normal conditions from the period of inflation.

He fails to notice that the debtor class and the creditor class—the producing and the consuming class—are composed of the same individuals, and include nine-tenths of the people.

Any injury to the creditor class is an injury to the debtor class. Each one of them must first earn, before he can buy, the things he must have to live; neither can he count the farmers out of the class injured by inflation. Mr. BECK probably knows that farmers do not eat their raw wheat, wear their raw wool, or make their own shoes of raw hides; that they sell the products of the farm to buy the same things wage-workers buy. The producers of raw material and the final consumers suffer most in times of inflation.

The middlemen are compelled to fleece those on each side of them to make good to themselves losses caused by a fluctuating currency. The prices to the consumer are always far higher than the reduction of them to a gold standard would indicate. I commend to Mr. BECK the columns in the table, which show the purchasing value to the farmer of the price of wool during the seventeen years of inflation (from 1861 to 1879) to be only 36½ cents, while in the five years preceding, it was 44 cents, and the five years succeeding was 42½ cents. He will find that the tables of prices of farm products and their real value con clusively contradict his statements.

Yearly cost of supplies of a family of four persons at the lowest point.

Prices compiled from the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1863 and 1873 and the Commercial and Financial reports of the Chamber of Commerce, and the Shipping List and Price Current of New York.—American Almanac.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to my colleague [Mr. WHITING].

The SPEAKER. There are nine minutes of the gentleman's time remaining.

Mr. WHITING. I will reserve that time, to be used by me in conjunction with ten minutes which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DARGAN] has promised to yield me at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. DARGAN. Mr. Speaker, a famous American statesman once said at a great crisis that he had but one lamp by which his feet were guided, and that was the lamp of experience. These words, so familiar to every schoolboy, have been justly regarded as evidence that Patrick Henry was a man of practical wisdom as well as an eloquent speaker, and they have been often quoted by those who have opposed the sober teachings of experience to the pausible suggestions of untried or discredited theories.

With singular want of fitness, as it seems to me, they have in this debate been quoted in support of the cause of bimetallism and the free coinage of silver. For, if I do not greatly misinterpret facts, the friends of silver while claiming a monopoly of the wisdom as well as the patriotism of the country, hold this so-called lamp of experience in utter contempt. They say by their actions, which speak louder than words—although their words are perhaps as a general rule sufficiently loud—that if there be one lamp by which their feet are not guided that lamp is the lamp of experience.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to seem disrespectful to any one and hope what I shall say will not be so regarded; but if a large number of those who call themselves the friends of silver are to be judged by their actions they expect to settle this controversy by denunciation and prophecy and not by an inquiry into the teachings of history. In the discussion of a purely financial question they seem to imagine that denunciation of opponents and demonstration of truth are equivalent terms. For more than two months past, in season and out of season, the friends of silver both in this House and at the other end of the Capitol have repeatedly and vehemently proclaimed those who differ with them frauds and conspirators, enemies not only of their own country but of the whole human race. They have included in these denunciations the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury, and their predecessors in office for many years past.

We have been informed with great gravity and the utmost emphasis that the Chief Executive of the nation and its principal financial agent, in violation of law and of the high trust reposed in them, have formed a wicked conspiracy with certain rich men of the country to oppress and impoverish the people. In support of this extraordinary charge not one scintilla of evidence has been adduced.

But this is not all. Loudly boasting of large majorities in both Houses of Congress and claiming to be the only true friends of the people, they have stood idly by, and have thus stood for many years, while, according to their own showing, the most sacred rights of their constituents have been trampled in the dust. They have neither put in motion the machinery by which under existing laws these traitors in high places can be called to account, nor, if existing laws be defective, have they taken the first step toward making new and better ones. All that they have done so far has been to send forth a blast of empty words. As far as these serio-comic charges of violation of law and conspiracy are concerned, these gentlemen may perhaps be safely left in the hands of their constituents. If they can satisfactorily explain to the too confiding people of whose cause they claim to be the special champions why they have been so fierce with their tongues and so gentle in their actions no harm will have been done to any one.

In addition to their denunciations, the so-called friends of silver have also, as already said, indulged to a very considerable extent in prophecy. We have been told a great deal about what might, could, would, and must happen if their theories should be adopted. They have very wisely, for the good of their arguments if not for the good of their country, had very little to say about what has happened when their theories have been actually tried. It would be inferred from the arguments in favor of free coinage and bimetallism either that the scheme which is now so confidently urged had never before been tried, or that, having been tried, it had proved a complete success. The undeniable fact is that, having been fully and fairly tried both in this country and in Europe, it has always been, and from the very nature of the case must always be, a complete failure. Now, denunciation is not argument and assertion is not proof.

What are the facts? Not all the innumerable facts which have been gathered up during nineteen centuries in regard to gold and silver production and gold and silver coinage at different times and in different parts of the world. All these may be interesting enough in themselves, and are certainly very useful, as this debate shows, in the construction of ingenious financial theories. But the facts which interest us now are the few plain, undeniable historical facts by which the theories under discussion have been tested. I hold that a plain statement of these facts—a brief and simple outline of our own experience with bimetallism—is a complete answer alike to the denunciations and to the prophecies of the so-called friends of silver.

In 1792, at the suggestion and under the skillful guidance of Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, Congress established a bimetallic system of currency for the United States. In making choice of the bimetallic system, instead of adopting a single standard of silver, which it seems was also thought of, Hamilton was influenced by a desire to have an abundance of metallic money. "To adopt the single silver standard," he said, "would be to abridge the quantity of the circulating medium." His views on this point, therefore, were identical with those of the bimetallists of the present day.

In a most important particular, however, Hamilton's views were diametrically opposed to the views of the so-called friends of silver. He did not believe in fiat money of any kind, half-breed or other. He had no confidence in the legislative arithmetic which declares that 80 cents' worth of bullion plus 20 cents of fiat make 100 cents of money. On the contrary, he wisely believed that human laws should be framed in accordance with, and not in contravention of, the laws of nature.

In his report on the establishment of a mint, he says:

There can hardly be a better rule in any country for the legal than the market proportion, if this can be supposed to have been produced by the free and steady course of commercial principles. The presumption in such case is that each metal finds its true level according to its intrinsic utility in the general system of money operations.

In selecting, therefore, the ratio between gold and silver under his bimetallic scheme he sought to find their market ratio, in order that he might make this the legal ratio; and although he unwisely, on account of the want of time, as he alleged, limited his inquiries as to the market ratio to the market of the United States, instead of inquiring as to the ratio in the markets of the world, by a happy accident the ratio hit upon was almost the exact ratio of the commercial world. This ratio was one ounce of gold to fifteen ounces of silver. At this ratio the scheme went into operation.

In 1793 silver slightly declined in value relatively to gold; that is, 1 ounce of gold got to be worth more than 15 ounces of silver. The decline steadily continued, with a slight reaction between 1803 and 1805, until 1813, at which time the ratio was about 1 to 16. By 1810 the amount of gold in circulation in the United States had perceptibly decreased. By 1818 the currency of the United States, bimetallic in name and theory, was monometallic in fact. The gold had disappeared from circulation and silver was the sole metallic currency and the single standard of value. Why was this? The explanation is exceedingly simple, but it seems to need to be constantly repeated. If there be two materials out of which, at his option, a man has an unlimited right to make dollars with which to pay debts, he will inevitably use the cheaper material in preference to the dearer.

If a gold dollar will buy 16 ounces of silver bullion, while 15 ounces of silver bullion coined into a dollar will pay as many debts as a gold dollar, 1 ounce of silver is saved in every transaction in which a silver dollar does the work of a gold dollar, and of course gold dollars cease to do the work which is as well done by cheaper servants. Gold, therefore, ceases to circulate as money and is hoarded as merchandise. And this is what is meant by the oft-referred-to Gresham law, which, expressed in its simplest form, is briefly, "that of two sorts of money in circulation, the cheaper will drive out the dearer."

Thus was taught by experience the first lesson in the United States in regard to bimetallism. Here we have the first light on this question from Patrick Henry's lamp of experience. It was demonstrated by actual experiment that with a system of free coinage and unlimited legal tender of both metals the cheaper metal will drive out the dearer; and "that the whole mass of both metals could not, as the bimetallists fondly dream," be made available as money, thereby increasing the amount of the circulating medium and enhancing the prices of commodities.

In estimating the value of this experiment it should be remembered that it was made under exceedingly favorable circumstances. The legal and market value of the two metals were almost identical when the system was initiated. At that time there was no prejudice for or against either gold or silver. It was before the day of "gold-bugs" and "bloated bondholders." The forces that were acting upon the currency were undisturbed by political influence of any kind. The movement by which the country passed from a double standard of gold and silver to a single standard of silver was almost unnoticed. But under the slow but sure and irresistible operation of natural laws the change was accomplished, and the law on the statute-books staid not its progress for one moment.

But the experiment of bimetallism was a continuous one as far as positive law could make it so. As early as 1819 a committee of this House, of which Mr. Lowndes, of South Carolina, was chairman, recognizing the real difficulty in maintaining the two metals in concurrent circulation, reported in favor of a new legal ratio of 1 to 15.6, to correspond with the then market ratio. For reasons not necessary to be noticed here no change was made in the law until 1834. In 1834 the legal ratio was changed by act of Congress from 1 to 15 to 1 to 16. There is much evidence to show that in making this change Congress did not, as in 1792, intend to establish a legal ratio corresponding to the market ratio. A considerable number of thinking men had by that time become thoroughly convinced that a single standard was the only standard which was practicable, and that this fact should be recognized by legislation.

By a majority perhaps the single standard of silver was then preferred to any other. A bill, however, was introduced in the House making the ratio 1 to 15.6. This was thought to be very near the market ratio, and was in the nature of a recognition of the desirableness of continuing the double standard. The ratio, however, was finally changed to 1 to 16, and in this form the bill became a law. This overvalued gold, and attention was called to that fact at the time, and the House was warned "not to bring about by hasty legislation the same state of things in relation to silver which had heretofore existed in relation to gold;" but notwithstanding this protest the act was passed, and is a striking illustration of the familiar saying that "history repeats itself."

Just before 1834 valuable gold mines had been discovered in North Carolina, and perhaps in one or two other Southern States. Of course the owners of these mines, like the owners of all other mines, wanted "protection." The desire on the part of certain members of Congress to "develop" these mines, co-operating with a belief on the part of others that a single standard was in every respect preferable to a double one, resulted in the passage of an act which, while ostensibly establishing a bimetallic scheme, was really intended to make gold the sole currency of the country and the single standard of value. The legal ratio was made 1 to 16, although it was well known that the market ratio was only 1 to 15.7. The result was, as Professor Laughlin has said in his very able and impartial History of Bimetallism in the United States, "if a debtor had $16,000 of silver coin he need take of it only $15,700, melt it into bullion, and in the bullion market buy gold bullion which, when coined at the mint into gold coins, would have a debt-paying power of $16,000. There was a profit of $300 in not using silver as a medium of exchange and in treating it as merchandise." Of course silver was driven out of circulation. It was hoarded as merchandise and gold became the sole metallic currency of the country and the single standard of value. Thus was taught by experience the second lesson (which was but a repetition of the first) in regard to a bimetallic system of currency in the United States. Natural laws act with absolute impartiality. Under the act of 1792 gold was undervalued and driven from circulation, and silver became the sole metallic currency of the country. Under the act of 1834 silver was undervalued and was driven from circulation, and gold became the sole metallic currency of the country. Is experience worth anything or are we utterly to disregard its teachings? But this is not all. From the conjoint effect of certain provisions of the act of 1792 and the provisions of the act of 1834 resulted a curious and striking illustration of the force of Gresham's law.

The act of 1792 in fixing the weights of the various coins which might be issued under the authority of the Government provided that the subsidiary coinage of fractional pieces, "the half-dollars, quarter-dollars, dimes, and half-dimes, should contain weights of pure silver proportional to the weights of the dollar piece; that is, two halves, four quarters, ten dimes, twenty half-dimes should contain as much pure silver as a dollar piece." This provision of the act of 1792 in regard to subsidiary coinage was not justified by the practice and experience of other nations, and eventually resulted in serious inconvenience to the country.

As long as silver was the current coin of the country there was no trouble. When, however, under the act of 1834 gold became the cheaper medium with which to pay debts, and it became profitable to hoard silver, the fractional coins, the halves, quarters, dimes, and half-dimes, so useful as change in retail transactions, were driven from circulation. For, as has been well said, "if a dollar-piece of silver had become worth 104 cents in gold, two halves, four quarters, ten dimes, or twenty-half dimes would be worth the same sum in gold, and there was, therefore, profit in exchanging gold for subsidiary silver." The result was that even the subsidiary silver currency was driven from circulation and the business of the country became seriously embarrassed for the want of small coins. To remedy this, Congress in 1853 passed an act so reducing the amount of pure silver in the fractional silver coins as to make their bullion value less than the bullion value of a gold dollar, and thus took away the inducement either to hoard them as merchandise or to convert them into bullion.

The amount of pure silver in a standard dollar piece has from 1792 to the present time been 371.25 grains. The act of 1853 reduced the amount in a dollar of subsidiary or fractional coins to 345.6 grains. "The reason for the reduction of weight, so that 100 cents of the small coins should be worth even less than the value of the gold dollar, is substantiated by the experience of many countries. It protects the subsidiary coins from disturbance, even if changes in the relative values of gold and silver drive out the one or the other metal which is coined in larger pieces." By the same act, in order to prevent the small coins through the operation of Gresham's law, from driving gold out of circulation, the amount of the issue was carefully guarded and their legal-tender was also limited to $5 in any one payment.

From 1853 till 1873 there was no coinage legislation, or at any rate none that requires notice here. In 1873 Congress passed the act by which it is said silver was demonetized. This act the friends of silver say was passed by fraud and has been the cause of untold woes to the country, and threatens still further trouble. Both of these statements I shall notice hereafter. The history of the metallic currency of the country from 1792 to 1853, or rather to 1873, a period of eighty-one years, has been briefly given. The facts stated can not be denied. On the contrary, they must be admitted by all to be true. The question is: Do they teach anything? Are we any wiser by reason of the experience of all these years? Like Patrick Henry, do we intend that our feet shall be guided by the lamp of experience, or do we propose to follow the guidance of the ignis fatuus of some unsupported or exploded theory?

Upon what ground do gentlemen expect that our experience in the future will be different from what it has been in the past? Are laws on the statute-book more potent now than in former years? Has the American Congress at length grown so wise and strong that it can put shackles on the laws of nature, and say, Thus far shall ye go and no farther? This would seem to be the conclusion of the friends of silver.

It will be seen that throughout my remarks when I speak of bimetallism I mean national and not international bimetallism. Unlike many who agree with me in regard to the suspension of silver coinage, I do not believe it practicable even to make the experiment of international bimetallism. I do not believe the preliminary international agreement necessary to the initiation of such a system can ever be reached. As my argument is based exclusively upon what I conceive to be the teachings of experience in regard to this question, I shall not discuss the untried theory of international bimetallism.

I believe that we should recognize boldly and at once that there is no well-grounded hope of ever securing international bimetallism (if that be desirable), and that a frank, open, and immediate return to the single gold standard, with subsidiary silver, is the only way out of our difficulties. Nor do I fear, as many do, that the masses of the people can not be induced to adopt the single gold standard. I have great confidence in the sound judgment as well as in the honesty of the people in regard to all questions which concern them, and upon which they have been properly enlightened. And the fact that no considerable number of them have ever supported the greenback heresy affords strong grounds for hoping that when they are fully informed they will also reject this kindred delusion of cheap silver.

But for observation to the contrary it would be natural to infer that the experience of the United States alone with bimetallism would be amply sufficient to demonstrate to the satisfaction of all its utter impracticability as a system of currency. But its history in the United States is only a counterpart of its history elsewhere.

Says a high authority:

The attempt to use two metals together has been kept up from the earliest use of money to the present time, and has constituted a problem in money. It was deemed necessary to use two metals, but no means has ever been devised for using two which has not failed, besides producing confusion, loss, injustice, and commercial distress.

Nowhere has it proved a success. Nowhere has the dream of the bimetallists that "the whole mass of the two metals should be used concurrently as money, thereby increasing the amount of the circulating medium and enhancing the prices of commodities," been realized. It is of course perfectly competent for the lawmaking power by proper inquiry to ascertain at any given time the market ratio of gold and silver, and to establish a legal ratio to correspond with the market ratio. But the difficulty is that the relative values of gold and silver like the relative values of other commodities vary in obedience to the law of supply and demand. The conditions of supply and demand for the two metals are by no means identical, and their fluctuations in value are therefore, except possibly by the merest accident, neither concurrent nor in the same direction.

The result is that variation from time to time in their relative market value so fatal to the working of the bimetallic system. The difficulty is obviously insuperable. It is a problem which can not be solved by human skill or ingenuity. One after another the great commercial nations of the world, recognizing the futility of attempts to legislate against natural laws, have abandoned the system. England, ever sagacious and in the van of commercial progress, as early as 1816 adopted the single gold standard with subsidiary silver coinage. Germany, between 1873 and 1875, by gradual steps followed the same course. The Scandinavian nations followed the example of Germany. Then came the United States, and shortly afterward France and the other States of the Latin Union closed their mints against silver; and, in the language of a distinguished writer, "the double standard ceased to be."

In the face of "this great historic movement" of experience and the dictates of reason and common sense are we to believe that all who advocate the single gold standard are frauds and conspirators? Are we to credit the suggestion that all these great nations, at a time when the rights of their respective peoples were better secured than ever before, changed their currency laws to help the rich at the expense of the poor? Or is it credible that a great nation like France or Germany would out of mere spite against a political rival change its financial policy? These suggestions are obviously too absurd to merit serious consideration.

Should we not rather conclude with Professor Sumner that:

Any one who reviews this series of historical facts, not in order to interpret them by some ulterior design assumed to have existed, but for just what they are, will see that there was no ulterior design, no set purpose, no agreement or combination, but that each nation acted as its own interests dictated, and that the concord of action and general tendency toward the adoption of gold on the part of all the great commercial nations substantially in the order of their commercial importance constitute one of those great historical movements which are not to be criticised or corrected, but which impose upon the student the convictions which he is to adopt.

In this connection as a part of my remarks I quote from a very able work ("The history of bimetallism in the United States," by Professor Laughlin, of Harvard University, a book to which I am deeply indebted for whatever of truth there may be in the views I have attempted to present) what I conceive to be the true explanation of this "great historic movement:"

A change in the uses of the metals has undoubtedly taken place; and the cause of it is to be sought in the natural forces which underlie the processes of exchange and trade. The increase of commerce and the need of making large payments in wholesale transactions, while it has developed the check and clearing-house system and all banking devices by which the risk in the actual handling of large sums of metallic money has been avoided, has at the same time increased the demand for that one of the two precious metals which has the greatest value in the smallest bulk. This is the modern form of the preference, or prejudice, for gold as compared with silver, and it is most evident in the countries which have the largest commercial interests at stake.

This being the character of the monetary desires of modern nations, the opportunity of satisfying these desires, rendered possible to a very large extent by the enormous production of gold since 1850, has been, in my judgment, the cause of the fall in the value of silver. The situation, in brief, was this: In 1850 the Western world possessed a certain sum of both gold and silver (with the exception of England and the United States, chiefly silver) in use as a medium of exchange, both metals, be it observed, being in use for a common purpose—the interchange of goods. Now, there was suddenly added in 1850–1875 about $3,000,000,000 of gold. What was the effect? A very simple and natural increase in the use of gold by all the countries which could get it. But just to the extent to which the desire for gold could be satisfied by countries which had hitherto used silver wholly or in part so far was the demand for silver as a medium of exchange diminished.

The new gold, therefore, because it was always preferred to silver, pushed it out of place, and, by filling the vacancy, took away from silver a part of the previous demand for the heavier metal. To the mind of the commercial world it was a substitution of a more convenient for a clumsier medium of exchange. In considering this movement in monetary progress, and comparing it with similar events in industrial progress in almost every branch of activity, no illustration seems to me more exactly to describe the change caused by the introduction of the new gold than that of steam. In former days the world carried on its exchanges by the slow, uncertain, and clumsy methods of coaches, wagons, and sails; now all is done, at less expense, more rapidly and conveniently, by railways and steamships. Both coaches and railways existed to transfer passengers and freight; so both gold and silver were used to interchange goods.

Formerly coaches were our chief dependence; so was it with silver. In later years the railway has supplanted the coach because it does the same service much better, leaving the coach to do minor work in other directions; in the same way gold is supplanting silver because it serves the needs of commerce better, and silver is relegated to use as subsidary coin for retail transactions. Consequently, when there is offered to a commercial country the choice between using gold and using silver we should as soon expect it to prefer silver as we should expect merchants to-day to send their goods from New York to Chicago by wagons instead of by railway. This is the tendency among modern states to which we wish to call attention.

Inasmuch as the production of gold from 1850 to 1875 was as great as in the three hundred and fifty-seven years preceding 1850, it can easily be seen what an opportunity was given to gratify the universal preference for gold to silver, coming as it did at the opportune moment when commerce began to expand in an unusual degree. To the extent of the surplus gold this absorption of gold could go on without interfering with its value, except to keep it from a fall. This is a striking fact in monetary history. Increase the production of gold enormously and it is eagerly absorbed, and so does not undergo much depreciation; but if the production of silver be increased to the same extent it is not permitted to displace gold in the commercial states, as in the case of gold; and the increase of silver only creates distress to know whether the usual outlets for silver in the East are sufficient to carry off the surplus.

Thirty-five years ago England and Portugal alone had a legal gold standard; all other countries, either by law or by the effect of circumstances, employed a silver currency. The United States had a double standard with but little silver in use; but Germany, France, and the countries of continental Europe had a silver medium. To-day the situation is entirely reversed. In Europe there is not a mint open to the free coinage of silver. Gold has unquestionably become the only real medium of exchange for commercial Europe. And all this, I contend, has been brought about by two things: the commercial preference for gold, and the extraordinary production of gold in California and Australia. In proportion as gold found a market silver was deprived of one, since they were both in use for the same purpose.

The preference for gold over silver here explained—a preference based solely on its superior utility as a medium of exchange for civilized nations having large commercial transactions—is the only kind of preference a rational man should allow himself to entertain. It is a preference which does not contemplate the abandonment of silver as money. It only seeks to relegate it to its natural position—the position of subsidiary money—that is, money to be used, as it has been used for many years in this country, in retail transactions only and not in the payment of large sums.

And the idea that because silver has been, and must continue to be, used as money in small transactions, that it is therefore in any rational sense "poor man's money," is inexpressibly absurd. Peck and quart measures are in no reasonable sense "poor man's" measures because they are used in retail transactions. They are the measures for all men who buy by the peck or the quart, as silver is the money of all who use it, and all do use it.

What the poor and the rich alike want are honest and convenient measures and honest and convenient money for all transactions large and small. And they do not want either measures or money which, while called by the same name they are called by now, may next month or next year measure or purchase, as the case may be, one-fifth less than they do now.

But let us return to our outline of the history of legislation in the United States in regard to its metallic currency. We are told that the act of 1873 was passed surreptitiously and was a fraud upon the rights of the people. Again let us appeal to the facts. At the time the act of 1873 was passed neither gold nor silver circulated as money. Paper was the sole currency of the country.

By the act of 1834, as we have seen, the two metals had been so valued as to drive silver out of circulation and make gold the sole metallic currency, which it continued to be until 1862, when it was superseded by the paper currency issued for the purpose of carrying on the war. When the act of 1853 was passed for the purpose of reducing the amount of pure silver in subsidiary coinage, it was expressly admitted that with the passage of that act went the last vestige of the double standard in the United States. In the debate preceding the passage of the act, Mr. Dunham, the gentleman who had charge of the bill, said upon the floor of this House:

Gentlemen talk about a double standard of gold and silver as a thing that exists and that we propose to change. We have had but a single standard for the last three or four years. That has been and now is gold. We propose to let it remain so and to adapt silver to it.

Objecting to a plan proposed in lieu of the one contained in his bill, the same gentleman said:

We would thereby still continue the double standard of gold and silver, a thing the committee desire to obviate. They desire to have the standard currency to consist of gold only, and that these silver coins shall be entirely subservient to it, and that they shall be used as tokens rather than as standard currency.

The act of 1853, therefore, was passed for the avowed purpose of adapting the subsidary silver coinage to the then existing single gold standard. It was important that the fractional silver coinage, the half-dollars, quarters, dimes, and half-dimes, so useful in retail trade, should be retained in circulation. But, as has been shown, containing as they did, under the act of 1792, weights of pure silver proportional to the silver dollar, they had under the operation of Gresham's law been driven from circulation by the cheaper gold, and the sole purpose of the act of 1853 was by reducing their bullion value to retain them in circulation.

These subsidiary silver coins, it should be particularly observed, were driven from circulation not because they were replaced by cheaper coins. There were no such coins to replace them, and their places were not supplied in any way until the embarrassment and inconvenience to business consequent upon their disappearance, and the almost entire absence of fractional coins suitable for retail transactions, induced Congress to pass this act of 1853 in order to remedy the evil. They were withdrawn from circulation for the simple reason that they were worth more as merchandise than they were worth as money, and of course whoever used them as money did so at a loss. This little piece of United States history effectually disposes of the theory which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], following Professor Francis A. Walker, clings to with so much pertinacity, namely, that "the inferior money never drives out the better except by replacing it."

The silver dollar had disappeared much earlier. Professor Simon Newcomb, a high authority on such questions, writing in 1879, thinks "it would be safe to assert that one-half of our citizens born since 1840 had never seen a United States silver dollar." Between 1806 and 1836 not a single silver dollar was coined at the Mint of the United States, and the whole amount of silver dollars coined from the establishment of the Mint in 1793 to 1873 was 8,045,838. It thus appears that in ninety years only a little over one-third of the number of silver dollars were coined which now, at the expense of millions of taxes to the people, are coined in one year.

The act of 1873, therefore, did not take a single dollar from circulation. It simply "struck the silver dollar from the list of coins which the Mint was permitted to coin, on which list it had stood as an idle, an unused permission, and brought the United States to the single gold standard with subsidiary silver" in theory, a position which she had long occupied practically.

Was this a fraud? Did it result in injury to the people? Did it cause "prosperity to flee from our shores, and the shadow of gloom to settle down upon us with a darkness that could be felt?" Did the mere omission to print a few words in a book, which neither took away nor added one cent to our circulation, result in such momentous consequences? Is there, then, so much in form and so little in substance? For forty years the substance of the law, its purpose, and its direct effect had been to give the country gold as its metallic currency, with subsidiary silver coins. The act of 1873 was a formal recognition of this state of affairs, and nothing more.

The friends of a sound currency, therefore, wish to emphasize the fact that since 1834, or, to avoid the criticism even of the most captious I will say, since 1853 the people of this country have had that exact system of metallic currency which it is claimed resulted from the act of 1873. This is a fact which can not be successfully controverted. It must be admitted by all intelligent men. How then can rational inquirers attach the least weight either to the bitter denunciations or the gloomy forebodings of the advocates of the free coinage of silver? After what has been said in regard to the law and the facts of our financial history prior to 1873 I shall not waste time in attempting to prove in detail that that act was not passed surreptitiously or fraudulently. It is a sound rule of common sense, as well as of law, that those who allege fraud must prove it.

There has not been a tittle of proof of the truth of the charge in this instance, and those who will take the trouble to read the reports and suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury and the accompanying documents, and the debates and proceedings of both Houses of Congress from April, 1870, to the 12th of February, 1873, the period during which the measure was under discussion, must reach the conclusion that the charge of fraud is not only baseless but absurd. That this is true may be inferred from the fact that in the minority report "on the free coinage of silver," which accompanies the bill now under discussion, the author of the "Bland act" himself, for obvious reasons, delicately, but at the same time very unequivocally, repudiates the theory that silver was demonetized by fraud.

Mr. BLAND. I did not say whether it was or not; but I have never yet seen a man who said he voted for the act or had anything to do with it.

Mr. TILLMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SESSIONS], who was a member at the time, may be able to say whether the act was put through fraudulently or not.

Mr. DARGAN. Professor Francis A. Walker, by far the ablest and best-informed bimetallist of this country of whom I have any knowledge, distinctly admits that "there is no evidence in support of the charge made by some bimetallists, that the legislation of 1873 demonetizing silver was obtained by a parliamentary trick or was inspired by sinister motives. (See Money, by F. A. Walker, page 242, note.)

But whether the United States formally adopted a single gold standard in 1873 fairly and openly or not is a question of very little practical importance. The striking and significant fact is that from 1834 to 1878 this has been a single-standard gold country. During that period of unparalleled progress and prosperity we had absolutely none of those silver dollars in circulation which are now declared to be so essential to our well-being and prosperity. Prior to 1834, as we have seen, we had no gold. Silver was then the sole metallic currency of the country. If, therefore, we have a bimetallic currency hereafter, it will be something entirely new—something we have never before enjoyed. Notwithstanding the friends of silver so earnestly advocate the bimetallic system, it is obvious from their own arguments that the more judicious of them do not believe it will ever be realized.

It is true that some of them because the coinage of $2,000,000 per month since 1878 has not resulted in driving gold from circulation cry out "where is Gresham's law?" But surely these gentlemen are too intelligent to believe that the bald fact that silver has not yet driven gold from circulation proves the non-existence of Gresham's law.

Our third experiment with bimetallism, which commenced in a lame and halting way in 1878, is not yet completed, but in legal parlance is now in fieri. But, as I have already said, the more intelligent friends of silver not only do not deny but, as their arguments will show, found all their hopes upon the existence and force of Gresham's law. They know with absolute certainty that the continued coinage of silver dollars under the Bland act, and of course their free coinage at the present enormous disparity between the legal and market ratios of the two metals, must inevitably result in driving gold from circulation and substituting silver in its place.

That this will result in enormous loss to all creditors they can not deny. That it will destroy confidence, and thereby check enterprise and industrial activity, to the detriment and loss of all classes, including debtors themselves, with singular want of perception, as it seems to me, they do deny with scorn and contempt.

But the goal of their hopes and the desire of their hearts is to have what they call "a debt-paying dollar." This so-called "debt-paying dollar" will be in reality a debt-scaling dollar, and will be nothing more nor less than 80 cents' worth of silver bullion with a falsehood stamped on its face by act of Congress.

It should be distinctly understood that those who favor the suspension of the Bland act, and of course oppose the free coinage of silver, do not desire that one piece of silver coin now in circulation should be withdrawn from use as money, nor do they believe one will be.

The silver dollars now in actual circulation have been and now are, together with the fractional silver coins, discharging the same fuuction that fractional silver coins discharged from 1853 to 1862. They are used as change in retail transactions, and in fact constitute a large part of the present subsidiary coinage of the country. Like all subsidiary coins, although their bullion value is not equal to their face value, as long as they are limited in amount they will on account of the necessities of trade circulate as money at their face value.

The danger is that, as they can be used to an unlimited extent as legal tender in payment of debts, when their volume swells to an amouut in excess of the demand for their use as subsidiary coins and the ability of the Government to redeem them in gold they will cease to be the allies and become the enemies of gold. They will then begin to be used as the chosen medium for the payment of debts. The moment this condition of affairs exists gold will command a premium and will retire from circulation, and there will necessarily result a sudden and violent contraction of the currency.

Silver will be our sole metallic currency and the 80-cent silver dollar our standard of value. When this shall have come to pass, we shall continue to speak of "dollars" and use "dollars" in the transaction of business, but we shall find that, though our money is called by the same name, it will by no means be the same thing that it was before. It will have been shorn of one-fifth of its capacity to serve us. Five dollars will then be required to do the same work now done by four. This will, of course, result in an inflation of the currency as well as a diminution in the value of all credits and all fixed incomes, wages, and compensation of every kind, and of the purchasing power of the silver dollar itself, which is now artificially sustained above its bullion value.

Passing by the incalculable injury which must result to all classes from a sudden contraction of the currency and a sudden and great lowering of the standard of value, let us examine very briefly the proposition upon which the advocates of silver, and particularly the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], so confidently insist, namely, that by an unlimited issue of silver dollars and a consequent increase of the amount of circulating medium prices of commodities will be greatly raised to the benefit of all, and especially the laboring man. It is true that a redundant currency increases the prices of commodities.

This familiar doctrine of the Greenbackers will not be denied when coming from the mouths of the friends of silver, nor is it strange that the advocates of half-breed fiat money should preach the same doctrine that the Greenbackers do. The difference between the advocate of the 80-cent silver dollar and the advocate of the greenback fiat dollar is one of degree and not of principle. The Greenbacker believes that Congress can say, "Let there be a dollar," and there is a dollar. The friend of silver does not go so far. He only believes that Congress can say, "Let there be one-fifth of a dollar," and straightway there is a fifth of a dollar. Why the friend of silver does not advocate tin—which is a metal and shines as bright as silver—for his dollar, thereby using more fiat and less value, and saving millions of taxes to the people annually, is no doubt a great mystery to his ally, the Greenbacker, and possibly to some other people. But I only mention this in passing.

What I propose now to consider is whether a general advance in prices necessarily increases the welfare and prosperity of the farmer and laboring man, or any one else. Let us take the case of the laboring man. Is the increase of his wages necessarily of benefit to him? The obvious answer is that this depends altogether upon whether the advanced wages have the same proportional purchasing power they had before the advance. If a laborer receives $2 for a day's work this year where he received only $1 last year, and the purchasing power of a dollar is the same now that it was then, he is evidently twice as well off by reason of the increase of his wages. If, on the contrary, while his wages have been doubled the price of flour, meat, coffee, cloth, and the other necessaries of life have been also doubled, he is not benefited in the slightest degree by the increase in the price of his wages.

There has been in fact no real increase of wages, but only an apparent one. The only difference is that he now takes twice as long to count his money, both when receiving and paying it out, as he did before. The plain elementary truth is that the money price of labor has nothing whatever to do with the welfare of the laborer. What concerns him is how many of the necessaries of life can he get with a day's labor—how much bread and meat, coffee and sugar, clothing and shelter? And so it is with the farmer.

If the price of his cotton, corn, or wheat increases in the same proportion only that the prices of the things which he buys increase, then he is not benefited by the rise of price. It costs him as much to live as it did before, and he can neither pay more debts nor lay up more money than before the increase took place. The idea that an increase of the circulating medium by increasing prices of labor and commodities necessarily increases prosperity is, I submit, an extraordinary one to be advanced by an American statesman who is old enough to remember the financial condition of this country, either at the North or at the South, a little over twenty years ago. Let us take the case of the late Confederate States.

The currency within that territory was then exceedingly plentiful, and prices were high enough to satisfy even the aspirations of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] or the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]. For instance, a breakfast at a restaurant in Richmond or Charleston, consisting in part of "strong butter and weak coffee," ranged from $50 to $150, according to the amount of such dainties a man might wish to consume. A suit of clothes could be bought from $1,200 up. A serviceable horse brought from $2,500 to $4,000. Now, according to the logic of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], this must have been a glorious place for a poor man. But it was not; and that fact is so well understood all over the South that I am satisfied that whatever course the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] may see fit to pursue it will be wise for the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS], when he sends forth his speech to his constituents, to have a special expurgated edition, leaving out what he says about the connection between an inflated currency and prosperity for the special use of those who are old enough to remember "confederate times."

Looking back to those dark days, the people of the South, with a pride which the North admits to be just, often speak of the skill and courage of confederate generals, of the endurance and heroism of confederate soldiers, and the noble fortitude and devotion of confederate women; but I am yet to hear of the first person who entertains an affectionate remembrance of confederate money, although it was in their dire extremity the only thing with which everybody was abundantly supplied, and which faithfully remained with everybody into whose possession it went.

The case of confederate money which I have cited is, of course, an extreme one, but it has many parallels and is a striking illustration of the truth upon which I am insisting—that there is no connection whatever between prices and prosperity. To suppose so is to mistake the name for the thing, the shadow for the substance. So far from the laboring man being benefited by the inflation of prices, it is a familiar and well-established truth that he is always a great sufferer whenever such inflation occurs.

I have spoken of the condition of affairs at the South during the war period. Now what was the condition at the North? Mr. J. H. Walker, of Massachusetts, in a recent address entitled, "Perils to wage-workers in continued silver coinage," shows by a careful comparison of the prices of labor and the necessaries of life during the period of the inflation of the currency resulting from the war with similar prices during the periods before and after that time, when the country enjoyed a sound currency, that laborers were injured and not benefited by the inflation.

The prices received, it is true, were much higher than the prices received either before or after that time, but the laborer had fewer comforts. He got more money and less of everything else. In other words, the prices of labor had risen less than the prices of everything else. Consequently he could not obtain for his labor as many of the things necessary for health and comfort as he obtained by the same labor before the general rise in prices. What Mr. Walker proves in minute and convincing detail in regard to this particular period is only an illustration of a general truth well known to all who have any acquaintance with the history of labor and wages.

Mr. James E. Therold Rogers, one of the most distinguished of living writers on this subject, in his recent great work, "Six centuries of wages and labor," after speaking of the delusion of a mere rise in prices, says:

> As, therefore, wages do not rise with prices, no crime against labor is more injurious than expedients adopted on the part of Government which tend to raise prices.

Yet the advocates of the 80-cent silver dollar are by their own showing trying to "adopt this very expedient," and assert with virtuous indignation that it is not only not "a crime against labor," but a very great service to it. As it appears to me, they will not only do harm in various ways if they succeed in their efforts, but their efforts themselves are now doing harm.

The outcome of all attempts to establish bimetallic systems of money has been the establishment of what has been appropriately called "the alternative standard;" that is, a single standard of either gold or silver as the one or the other happens for the time being, under a given legal ratio, to be the cheaper metal. It is evident that such a system is radically vicious. It creates a constant possibility that lenders will get back not merely a different amount but always a less amount of purchasing power at the maturity of loans than was parted with when the loans were made. This uncertainty and danger of loss must necessarily tend to destroy confidence and check enterprise, to the injury of all classes of the community, debtors as well as creditors.

It can not admit of reasonable doubt that the present depression in business of all kinds is due to a very considerable extent to the uncertainty as to whether our future standard of value is to be the gold dollar of 100 cents bullion value, or the silver dollar, so called, of 80 cents bullion value. Certainly no man is willing to lend a 100-cent gold dollar when there is even a remote possibility that he will be repaid with an 80-cent silver dollar. It is no answer to this to say that lenders by special contract can provide against this danger. For, to say nothing of the friction, hindrance, and delay necessarily incident to such a method of doing business, borrowers themselves would hesitate to make a contract which they might find it both difficult and expensive to fulfill.

For it is obvious that when for any reason gold ceases to circulate in a community as money, it can not then be conveniently used as money. In other words, it can not be at one and the same time a circulating medium and not a circulating medium. The advocates and supporters of free coinage and the Bland act are therefore, I charge, to a very large extent responsible for that depression in business and want of industrial activity which they, with so much bitterness, lay at the doors of the "gold-bugs" and "bloated bondholders." This sad condition of affairs, which is indeed very deplorable, and which is especially trying to all poor communities, and to the poor of all communities, is certainly not due to a scarcity of money, as the silver men allege.

The undeniable fact is that there is an unusually large amount of unemployed money in the country. The trouble can not be due to the scarcity of silver dollars, for it seems that the increase of these riches, like the increase of knowledge, "increaseth sorrow." As the amount of silver dollars increases the financial depression also increases. The trouble is clearly not a want of money, but want of confidence—not too few 80-cent dollars, but too many. In short, the device of flooding the country with depreciated silver dollars in order to make everybody rich seriously threatens to make everybody poor. And when it is remembered how many of the advocates of free coinage are opposed to the passage of the bankruptcy bill now pending we may reasonably expect that the result of Congressional legislation will be not only to create but also to keep on hand an abundant supply of those "poor men," so near to the heart and so necessary to the eloquence of the average politician.

The widespread want of confidence now existing is, I believe, especially injurious to the South. Venturing to speak for my own State only (at least so much of it as I have the honor to represent), just emerging from the gloom and poverty consequent upon disastrous defeat in war, made ten-fold more terrible by eight years of unparalleled violence, pillage, and robbery under the forms of law, what her people need above all things is capital with which to develop their resources. This they can never hope to get on satisfactory terms in the present unsettled condition of the currency. A sound and stable currency is the indispensable condition of our future progress toward financial independence and prosperity.

Our people are not dismayed by past disasters or paralyzed by present poverty, and whatever strangers and aliens may say about them, I know that under just and equal laws, with an honest and stable currency, they are both able and willing to work out their own social and financial salvation.

Never through my lips will they ask alms of the Federal Government. Never by my vote will they commit the supreme folly of seeking to get rid of the obligation to pay their just proportion of the national debt, wherever and by whomsoever the same may be held. I repudiate, therefore, the suggestion that it is the interest of the South to unite with the West against the East and the North in enacting such laws as will enable us to pay the national debt in depreciated silver dollars. I deny that it is the interest of the South, or of any other section, of the people of any section, or of any part of them, that this great nation should evade, directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, the payment of all of its just debts according to the spirit as well as according to the letter of its contracts. At a crisis like the present it is well for us all, whatever section or whatever interest we may represent, to remember the oft-quoted and familiar but profoundly true and wise remark of Edmund Burke, that "justice is itself the great standing policy of civil society, and any departure from it under any circumstances lies under the suspicion of being no policy at all." By this broad, comprehensive, far-reaching, wisest of all policies I shall govern my actions in regard to this question, be the consequences what they may. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WHITING].

Mr. WHITING. Mr. Speaker, no one will deny the importance of a sound currency in the conduct of the commercial affairs of a nation.

It must be admitted that the least variable standard of value is best suited for the basis of such a currency, and there can be no doubt which metal, gold or silver, best fulfills this condition.

No one can dispute the fact that the great commercial nations prefer gold to silver, because the former is more easily handled and more stable in value. The advocates of silver coinage may inquire why this preference for gold has not existed before, and how it happens that the hostility to silver suddenly appears throughout the world? The answer may be found in the fact that gold has grown much more abundant since 1850, so that the people having a preference for it have been able to secure a supply.

Great Britain manifested its preference in 1816 and Germany in 1873, and when France found she was losing her gold she stopped the coinage of silver in order to retain the more valuable metal. In dealing with this subject we must remember that the nations of the earth have been progressive in the use of material for currency. From cattle and hides they passed to iron and copper and brass, and then to silver and gold. Gold now becoming plenty and being better adapted than silver as a measure of value, is gradually supplanting silver. I think, therefore, in the increased production of gold since 1851 may be found a solution of the question why it takes the place of silver. Contrast the figures representing the production of the two metals from 1493 to 1850, a period of three hundred and fifty-seven years, in which the production of gold was $3,314,553,000. From 1851 to 1875, a period of only twenty-five years, it was $3,317,625,000.

This enormous increase in the production of gold enables the nations that prefer it to obtain a supply. It is simply an instance of the superior driving out the inferior, which we find everywhere. In mechanics the improved machine drives out the old; Bessemer steel takes the place of iron; and everywhere in the march of progress the improved displaces the unimproved. I think this may be affirmed of the metals gold and silver—the more convenient and more valuable metal will drive out the other. You can not prevent by law or invective the preference of the world for gold over silver. We must accept it as a fact and deal with the question in the light of this information. I do not believe the most ardent advocate of a silver standard would hesitate if he had a debt to pay, and had the money to pay it in gold and silver, which to use in the liquidation of that debt. He would use the silver and keep the gold, because gold is more stable and more conveniently kept, thus illustrating in a practical way the operation of Gresham's law.

In what I have said thus far I do not express a preference for gold. I do not assert that it is wise to substitute gold for silver. I simply point to the fact that the great commercial nations have shown a preference for it, and as we are exchanging products with them we must do it on the basis of gold. This fact renders it imperative on our part to consider the question of which currency we will have, for if the balance of trade should be largely against us and we continue the coinage of silver, we should be driven to the silver standard. It would be criminal on our part if we fail to examine and consider the effect of this on the welfare of the people. The question for us to decide then is whether there shall be continued coinage of the standard silver dollar. If there is enough silver already coined to meet the demands of business, then it seems the answer should be no. If there is not silver enough to meet this want, then the answer should be yes.

It strikes me that it is very unwise to issue money that is not required to transact the business of the country easily and without restraint. No one would maintain that it would be wise to issue paper money beyond the needs of commercial transactions. Such a course would bring disaster upon every one, and especially upon the wage-workers, whom it seems to be the object of those advocating a silver currency to protect. And why should the compulsory coining of silver continue when we already have more than we can profitably employ? That is the question that should be answered definitely and clearly. If silver is sought after by the people as a medium of exchange, and they can not obtain it, that would be an indication that it is scarce and that we need more of it. If the bankers of the country are called upon to furnish it and can not obtain it, that would be another indication that more of it is needed. If the Treasury of the United States is depleted of silver because of the demands of business, that would be still another indication of its scarcity.

But what is the fact? It is incontrovertible that there is more than enough coined to meet all of these demands, and the Treasury is at its wits' end to know what to do with the silver that it has in its vaults and that can not be absorbed in the current transactions of business. I say can not advisedly. It will not do to say that bankers or capitalists conspire against the use of silver. If there is a demand for it for currency these parties can not prevent its use. But the fact is the people do not want silver in excess of the demands of trade. They do not desire the Government to continue to buy silver and pay out its gold for it. They do not desire that the money that might be paid out to redeem the public debt shall be used to purchase silver bullion and pile it up in the Treasury where it is of no service to any one.

I repeat that the people will not have this money if they can get any other, and the evidence on this point is that during the Republican administration of the Treasury every effort was made to increase the use of silver certificates by sending them to distant points in exchange for the deposits of gold; and what was the result? These certificates were returned to the Treasury in such quantities that it was with the greatest effort the country was saved from a silver basis. The people would not have this money; and they kept their gold, and their greenbacks redeemable in gold, and returned the silver certificates to the Treasury, already overburdened with silver and its representatives.

I will not stop to read the tables, but 40.6 per cent. of the revenue of the Government was received in silver certificates in January, 1885, while by the withdrawal of the privilege referred to only 14.8 per cent. was received in January, 1886. When the new administration came into power it did so with the distinct notice that it would maintain so far as it was in its power the gold basis. Not, as I understand it, because it would favor the capitalist or the creditor, but from a desire to maintain a sound currency, that every member of the community may feel that whatever he buys or sells shall be paid for in the least variable standard of value. This disposition on the part of the administration is worthy of the highest commendation, and if it succeeds in preventing us from being overwhelmed with the misfortunes of a depreciated currency it will be entitled to the highest praise.

Again I ask, is additional silver required? In answer to this I point to the fact that the silver dollars in the Treasury continue to accumulate notwithstanding the most industrious efforts to get them into circulation. All small bills have been withdrawn as far as it is practicable that these silver dollars may circulate. Presenting a five-dollar bill anywhere, one has a weight of silver thrust upon him that it is burdensome to carry about. But, nothwithstanding all these efforts, silver continually accumulates in the Government vaults until vast sums of money have to be expended to provide places where the dollars can be stored. One of the best illustrations that no more standard dollars are required is a glance at the figures showing the amount in the hands of the public:

On the 1st of July, 1881, there were	$28,123,405
On the 1st of July, 1882, there were	31,620,598
On the 1st of July, 1883, there were	34,893,389
On the 1st of July, 1884, there were	39,545,461

Up to this year you will observe that the silver dollars in the hands of the public increased from three to five millions of dollars each year. This shows that when the people need the coin it goes into circulation. On the 1st of July 1885 the silver dollars in circulation were 38,471,269—a falling off of $1,000,000 from the 1st of July 1884; and here again is illustrated the point that when the dollars are not needed they remain in the Treasury.

Again, the amount of the outstanding certificates, representing silver in the Treasury on the 1st of July, 1881, was $39,110,729, and they reached the greatest amount on the 1st of January, 1885, $114,865,911. On the 1st of July, 1885, these certificates were $101,530,946, a falling off of $13,334,965 in six months, and in the same time the silver certificates owned by the Treasury increased from $23,302,380 to $38,370,700, and the net amount of silver dollars in the Treasury increased in the same time $31,509,085. In other words, despite every effort to make silver popular, despite the opinion that the country is clamorous for these silver dollars, the resources of the Treasury in silver were increased in six months $46,577,405. These figures show conclusively that the limit had been reached at which silver could be absorbed in the currency, and the only resource left to get it into circulation is to withdraw the bank notes and the Treasury notes.

Think of the absurdity of the idea that we need further silver coinage when we have this increasing accumulation of dollars, and what injustice to the tax-payers to compel them to buy twenty-four millions per annum for which there is no use. On the 1st of July, 1885, there were of standard dollars and silver certificates in the Treasury a total of $102,252,866. The advocates of silver coinage say, why not pay this money to the public creditor? The answer is plain if the Government desires to continue on the basis of a sound currency. The moment the Treasury pays any considerable part of its obligations in silver, that moment all of our commercial transactions would be upon a silver basis; gold and silver would part company. We should then have silver as a standard instead of gold; and then it would be apparent to every one that the silver dollar is worth but 80 cents. We should have to pay our obligations abroad with gold at a premium; and the price of every article of merchandise in our own land would be raised to cover the depreciation in the value of the circulating medium. It is plain enough that the consumer is not to be the gainer by the continued coinage of silver, for no one can fail to see that all commodities would advance, at least, to cover the difference in the value between the metals.

I have already, I think, shown that there is more silver coined than is required for the wants of trade. Now, what possible advantage can it be to any one to have more silver coined? Will it not be disastrous to every interest, East and West, to continue this coinage until we are forced to a silver basis? Those who are in favor of the suspension of the coinage of silver answer emphatically yes, and point to the fact that notwithstanding the coinage the price of silver bullion has continually declined, and the value of all commodities has also been reduced to a lower point than it has reached during the last century. If any good result could be shown as a consequence of the continued coinage we might hesitate in our opinions; but when prices are lower than ever before, we must deny that a single benefit has accrued to any class of our people.

We have a surplus of silver and of money lying in the vaults of the banks and the Treasury, and I think may fairly conclude from our experience that an increase of silver, or of any money, will not advance prices. There are causes too subtle for analysis here operating on the industries of the country, which are beyond the influence of a redundant currency. Let us, therefore, suspend the coinage until there is a demand for silver. Let us relieve our people of this tax of $24,000,000 per annum, and I have no doubt all sections of the country will unite in asking for a resumption of the coinage when more silver is required.

We have been informed repeatedly that the demand for a suspension of the silver coinage comes from the capitalists and the creditor class. If the persons who have saved small or large sums of money believe, as I am sure they do, that their capital would be of less value by 10 or 20 per cent. if we are compelled to use silver as a standard of value, have they not a right to protest against such a policy? Have they not the right to urge that the Government shall maintain the currency on the soundest possible basis? I think they have the right and that it is their duty to do so. This is not a question of the East against the West, but it is a question of honest money.

We are frequently told that the creditor class advocate the demonetization of silver, because the effect would be to make it much more difficult for debts to be paid, and that it would reduce the value of all property. The creditor class, who largely own the property of the country, are thus accused of scaling down their own property one-half for the purpose of making it difficult for a debtor to pay his interest. This ridiculous proposition needs no comment. On the contrary, when England and Germany demonetized silver no such result followed, but property advanced in value and the rate of interest has declined, wages advanced, and the condition of the people has improved.

It is sought to raise a prejudice against the persons who control large amounts of capital, and it is represented that these persons are located almost wholly in the East. It would be a difficult problem to balance up the various interests that would gain and lose by the adoption of the silver basis. Experience teaches that in the long run the passage from a sound to an inflated currency, and back again to a sound one, is a painful and disastrous operation. Very few are the gainers, and if any one gains it is pretty sure to be the capitalists. They are generally prepared for every emergency, and by investing their funds in foreign exchange and foreign securities they are doubtless well prepared for any crisis. I think it is safe to say that this class would not be the losers, but by their superior facilities for taking care of their interests might be the gainers by such a misfortune.

Now, who is the creditor class? Is it the people with their small savings aggregated in savings-banks and national banks and trust companies, or is it the bank president, the railroad operator, the cattle king, or the bonanza king? Are these people located in the East or the West, the North or the South? I think if those who rail at the capitalists will examine the subject they will find that the rich people and the creditor class are pretty well distributed throughout our domain. Men of large means are found in the South as well as the North, and great fortunes have been made in the West as well as in the East. The person who attempts to excite prejudice against any one who has amassed a fortune, no matter in what section of the Union he may live, is not doing a service to the people.

Individuals and States that promote and foster their own welfare welcome these men and every institution that can afford a people credit. There is no institution that can be of such service to a sparsely settled and poor community as a bank or a capitalist. While they may profit by loaning their money, the community will also be stirred to new life in all of its enterprises, and will be stimulated to its highest and best activity. If these people are denounced and driven away, the loss will fall far heavier upon the community than upon the capitalist or the bank. Capital is timid and easily moved, but the community from which it is driven is a permanency, and will thrive or suffer just in proportion as it treats every interest fairly and generously.

It is popular in some quarters to denounce the banks as oppressing the people. If any instances were mentioned where they do oppress a community we might have faith in this statement, because of its frequent reiteration but no account is ever given of any harm that has ever come from the establishment and conduct of a sound bank. The constituents of the gentlemen who denounce these institutions continue to profit by them, and if their representatives in Congress succeed in destroying them, they will take away one of the chief supports of the prosperity of their own communities.

But who owns the banks? The impression is sought to be given that it is the large capitalists. This may be true in some cases, but in more it is not. In New England the savings-banks are very large holders of national-bank stock. I presume the same is true in all parts of the country. These savings-banks and national banks and trust companies and life insurance companies represent the accumulated capital of our land to a large extent, and these institutions also represent the people who have saved small sums of money.

The savings-banks depositors in Massachusetts are 826,008, having $262,720,147—or $318.06 to each person. The savings-banks in New York have 1,165,174 depositors and $437,107,501 of deposits, or $375.14 per person. There are 3,071,495 depositors in the United States having $1,095,172,147 of deposits, an average of $356.56 to each person. With this money mills are built and the working capital is furnished. From these depositors indirectly the merchant borrows whatever his necessities compel him to have, and this is the creditor class that would suffer if the country were to go to a silver standard. These $1,000,000,000 would be worth but $800,000,000; 20 per cent. would come off from the $356.56 in the savings-banks and the depositor would find that he had but $285.33, and that he had been defrauded of about $70 by a depreciated currency.

These are the people who would suffer, but not the capitalist who puts his money into foreign exchange, or whose rents and securities are advanced to meet the exigencies of such a currency. The beneficiary of a life-insurance policy would receive pay in a debased currency, and $200 would be stricken off of every $1,000 paid. The millions of wage-workers throughout the land would receive their pay in this currency, and would be the first to suffer in the change to a silver basis. To raise the rate of wages is a work of time, while everything that the laborer consumes would advance at once. The loss to this class would be millions of dollars yearly. The influence of this money would therefore find its way into every home, and in most homes would create distress and disaster. Who then would be profited by the adoption of a silver standard? No one permanently. Temporarily, those who are in debt, the manufacturers, and the merchants who would sell their goods at inflated prices and pay off their debts.

No one in the East argues in favor of a contraction of the currency. No one desires that money shall be made dearer or more difficult to get. All we contend for is sound money. Coin all the silver that can safely be incorporated in our monetary system, but do not force the coinage to the point where we shall have nothing but silver. Remember if we are forced to a silver basis we can not avoid the evils of a depreciated currency. I do not think there would be such fluctuations as we have had in the past where our people have lost more than they have by all the wars which we have experienced, but it is wise for us to avoid any approach to such disastrous results.

Mr. Speaker, an appeal for the suspension of the coinage of silver can not be more fittingly brought to a close than by quoting the words of Mr. Webster, uttered more than fifty years ago in this Capitol:

> A sound currency is an essential and indispensable security for the fruits of industry and honest enterprise. Every man of property or industry, every man who desires to preserve what he honestly possesses, or to obtain what he can honestly earn, has a direct interest in maintaining a safe circulating medium—such a medium as shall be a real and substantial representative of property, not liable to vibrate with opinions, not subject to be blown up or down by the breath of speculation, but made stable and secure by its immediate relation to that which the whole world regards as of permanent value. A disordered currency is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy, and it fosters the evil spirits of extravagance.

[Great applause.]

Mr. LORE. Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States prescribes that Congress shall have power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin." In the exercise of that authority Congress, on February 2, 1792, passed "An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States." The act provided for the coinage of ten, five, and two-and-a-half dollar gold pieces, called, respectively, eagles, half-eagles, and quarter-eagles, containing for each dollar thereof 27 grains of standard gold, which consisted of 24¾ grains of pure gold and 2¼ grains of silver and copper alloy. It provided also for the coinage of silver into dollar, half-dollar, quarter-dollar, dime, and half-dime pieces.

The silver dollar was the monetary unit and contained 416 grains of standard silver, made out of 371¼ grains of pure silver and 44¾ grains of copper alloy. The smaller silver coins were of like proportion of pure metal and alloy. These coins were declared to be "a lawful tender in all payments whatsoever," and their coinage was free.

By act of June 28, 1834, about 6 per cent. of pure gold was taken away from the gold-dollar value. It was reduced to 25⅘ grains of standard gold, consisting of 23⅕ grains of pure gold and 2⅘ grains of alloy. A seigniorage of one-half of 1 per cent. was charged for coinage.

By act of January 18, 1837, 3½ grains of copper alloy were taken away from the silver dollar, reducing the weight to 412½ grains of standard silver, consisting of 371¼ grains of pure silver, 41¼ grains of copper alloy. The smaller silver coins were reduced in like proportion.

The one-dollar gold coin and double eagles, or twenty-dollar gold pieces, were authorized by act of March 3, 1849. All the foregoing coins were of full legal-tender value.

By act of February 21, 1853, the coinage of three-dollar gold pieces was authorized, and a radical change was made in the weight and quality of the silver half-dollar, quarter-dollar, dime, and half-dime pieces. The weight of one dollar's worth of any of these coins was reduced from 412½ to 384 grains of standard silver, consisting of 345⅗ grains of pure silver and 38⅖ grains of copper alloy. The bullion for such coinage was to be purchased by the Director of the Mint, and such coins were a legal tender for all debts not exceeding $5.

The act of February 12, 1873, suspended the coinage of the silver dollar, and made the gold dollar the unit of value. It authorized the coinage of the silver trade-dollar, and made it a legal tender for debts not exceeding $5. The trade-dollar contained 420 grains of standard silver or 378 grains of pure silver, 42 grains of copper alloy.

The act of March 3, 1875, authorized silver 20-cent pieces.

The joint resolution of July 22, 1876, took away the legal-tender quality of the trade-dollar.

The act of February 28, 1878, (known as the Bland act) re-established the coinage of the standard silver dollar of 412½ grains and restored its legal-tender quality, and made it again a unit of value. By this act the Secretary was authorized and directed to purchase and cause to be coined into standard silver dollars each month, not less than two nor more than four million dollars' worth of silver bullion.

Such is a brief review of our silver and gold coinage laws.

The ratio in value under these laws from 1792 to 1834 was one dollar of gold to fifteen of silver, and from 1834 to this date one to sixteen.

THE SILVER DOLLAR.

It will be seen that the standard silver dollar has consisted of 371¼ grains of pure silver from 1792 up to this time, and has also been a unit of value and a full legal tender in payment of all debts during that time.

In 1873 it was demonetized by inadvertence it is claimed by some, others say fraudulently, certainly without due consideration. This is clearly shown by the action of Congress in 1878, when its coinage was resumed and legal-tender quality restored by decisive majorities after the most thorough examination. So emphatic was this expression that when President Hayes interposed his veto, both Houses of Congress, on February 28, 1878, the very day he returned the bill with his objections, passed it over the veto by more than a two-thirds vote.

The silver dollar has therefore remained unchanged in quantity of pure silver from the time of Alexander Hamilton, who fixed its quantity in the law establishing our coinage system in 1792, and has fully met the needs and exigencies of our financial life.

THE GOLD DOLLAR.

The gold dollar as a distinct coin was unknown in our history until 1849, when it was first coined. Prior to that time it was only known in combination in the larger gold coins. From 1792 to 1834 it contained 24¾ grains of pure gold, and from 1834 up to this date only 23⅕ grains, thus losing in 1834 six per cent. of pure metal in its adaptation to our national finances.

OUR GOLD AND SILVER COINAGE.

Under these laws there have been coined and there are now in circulation of silver and gold coin:

1. The gold dollar unit 23⅕ grains pure gold.
2. The silver dollar unit 371¼ grains pure silver.
3. Fractional or subsidiary silver coin, $1 in value, containing 345⅗ grains of pure silver.

The amount of each kind in circulation in the United States January 1, 1886, as stated by the Director of the Mint, was:

Gold coins	$553,810,148
Standard silver dollars	218,259,761
Subsidiary silver coin	75,034,111
Total	847,104,020

THE GOLD AND SILVER DOLLAR ARE EQUIVALENTS.

The gold and silver dollar have been and still are interchangeable one with the other. They have been and now are of exactly equal legal value, and of precisely the same purchasing power. Everywhere in the United States the silver dollar will buy just the same quantity of the necessaries of life as the gold dollar. As measures of value and equivalents of exchange they mutually support and equalize each other, and have so uniformly and beneficially acted in all our history. Gold and silver constitute the basis of our financial system. They are the two massive pillars upon which our country has rested the vast mechanism of her material prosperity, and upon which she has builded a structure of such wondrous financial proportions.

OUR MONETARY SYSTEM HAS BEEN AND NOW IS BIMETALLIC.

Whatever, therefore, may be said of the fact that at certain periods gold has been the cheaper and more commonly used metal; that at other periods silver has superseded it for a series of years, or of the fact that at times they both have disappeared practically from circulation, and have given place to paper and other currency, still gold and silver coin together have ever been conceded to be the duplex basis of our past and present national finances. If one was more abundant in use, the other was ready at hand to meet emergencies and spring up like the invisible warriors of Roderick Dhu to meet every crisis.

The system comes to us tested by the experience of nearly one hundred years of grand national success. It is commended by the teachings of the wisest of our political economists.

The single gold-standard system prevailed in our country only from 1873 to 1878—five years. They were five of the most disastrous years of our history.

In the light of past experience we are called upon to-day to decide practically whether we shall become a monometallic or bimetallic country; that is, whether our coins shall be gold only, or gold and silver.

No thoughtful person will deny that the establishment by law of the gold dollar as the sole unit and standard of value must necessarily demonetize silver and make it merely a matter of merchandise. All property, including silver, would then be measured by the quantity of gold. This is the naked proposition now before us.

There is a class of men who assert that if we stop the coinage of silver dollars that alone will enhance its value, keep it on a par with gold, and thus establish bimetallism. In other words, the best way to insure its use is not to use it at all. For this is the logic of the reasoning.

MEASURES OF VALUE.

The advocates of gold as the standard of value assert that gold is a more stable and uniform measure of value than silver, and, as the precious metal, is more convenient for use in large quantities.

It is conceded to be more convenient for use in large coins, but it must also be conceded that for coins of smaller denomination it is so minute as to be of no service. The gold dollar coin could not be kept in circulation, and no attempt has ever been made to use it in smaller denominations. For such smaller coins, silver has been in constant use. It is equally true that in large quantities neither gold or silver is delivered, or actually passes from hand to hand. This is usually effected by check, draft, or other commercial device.

As a measure of value, gold is not fixed, nor can it be. In the past it has constantly fluctuated. Silver has been the more stable of the two, measured by labor. In the nature of things there can be no absolutely fixed measure of value. Such measures are relative because of dual function of being at the same time a measure of value and an equivalent of exchange, the latter function removing it from fixed measures as a yard stick, and the like, which measure quantity only, not quality.

Adam Smith says:

Human labor is a more correct measure of intrinsic value than either silver or gold.

The multiple standard, or the average price of a number of the necessaries of life for a specific time, is another method of expressing the same thought, and is advocated by many. These have the merit of making labor, the creator of capital, measure the creature and not the creature measure the creator.

The gold measure, the ideal yard-stick of speculative statesmen, is therefore a variable quantity in proportion to its scarcity and other conditions, and if left alone would be an arbitrary and capricious master. All property and values would expand or shrink with its abundanee or scarcity, either natural or artificial.

It is estimated that all the gold in the world could be compressed in a cube of 29 feet square. Small in bulk, usually controlled by a few, we should on the gold basis be at the mercy of the great money-kings and of financial centers. This would consummate the idea lately announced on this floor, with an "Io triomphe" air that "Gold is king."

We need the corrective and modifying influence of silver, the other money metal. If gold be scarce silver supplies the need, and an equipoise is kept that insures stability. Certainly with the aggregate of these two metals artificial contractions and expansions by speculation would be avoided.

As a measure of value of the same quantity of human labor, or of the necessaries of life in the past, the 371¼-grain pure silver dollar has been found by actual calculation to be more nearly an average than the 23⅛-grain pure gold dollar. Silver has more evenly kept pace with human needs and productions than gold; while gold and silver together have by their automatic equalization made as nearly a stable standard of value as is possible in human transactions.

It must be remembered that measures of value are artificial creations, prescribed by law. In our country the people, who are the law-makers, have wisely fixed this dualistic standard, suggested by wisdom and proved best by experience.

When the metals parted company in bullion value in 1834, the quantity of pure gold in the gold-dollar value was reduced 6 per cent. If needful, why could not this be done again? Has not gold risen in value out of proportion to all sources of wealth? If so, justice demands equalization; not by adding to burdens already crushing.

WHICH IS THE HONEST DOLLAR?

It is urged with vehemence that the silver dollar is a dishonest dollar—one of only 80 cents in value. In all the newspapers representing the capitalists this assertion has been iterated again and again until by many its truth is assumed.

When and how did this historic dollar become dishonest? It has been the one unchanged and unchanging factor in our finances, honest to debtor and creditor alike. It is the only coin in our history that has continued the same at all times. The silver dollar of 1792 is identically the silver dollar of 1886 in pure metal. Is not its offense that it has held capital and labor in the same even and inexorable balance, and has kept interest rate within the capacity of the borrower? Has not gold risen in value fully one-fourth? Shall the usurer's gain be increased one-fourth, therefore, by another turn of the financial screw, and a fourth more of human toil and of the necessaries of life be given by the toiling, borrowing millions to the lending few? Fix the gold unit and this is an accomplished fact as values now stand. The gold standard would rob the many, enrich the few.

Concede that the bullion in the gold and silver dollar have parted company. They have frequently done so in our past history. It is markedly so now, partly because our Government has persistently discredited its own silver coinage, partly because of the decreased production of gold and its great absorption and demand in mechanical uses. The fact still remains that as coins of the United States they have precisely the same legal value. They are coined only for use in our own country. They do not pass as coins in other countries, but are bought and sold only as bullion. With bullion we pay balances of trade against us and meet all demands of foreign exchange.

Measured by all human wealth silver has lost no value. Gold has gained for causes stated; but gold may call silver dishonest for this no more than the richer man may call the poorer dishonest because adventitious circumstances have changed their relative means. It is not absolute but relative purchasing power that is the measure of honesty.

PROTECTION OF LABOR.

The continued coinage of silver dollars, it is claimed, wrongs the laborer, that his interests are best served by suspension. If true, this should awaken earnest opposition. Is not the assumption based on error? Laborers have been called capitalists. The idea was formulated by Mr. Bayard in his speech in the United States Senate in 1878, in this language:

> It can not be that the laboring classes are the debtor classes; on the contrary, as I say, there is not a day in the year when the sun goes down when they are not the creditors of capital for the amount of their wages for that time.

This assumes that laborers are capitalists, or of the creditor classes, but with the accommodating suggestion that the sun shall first go down each day in order to make them such.

The great labor classes are neither capital nor creditor classes, save in mockery—they are the producing classes. Their daily labor is the product they bring each morning into the market for sale to the best advantage. They have a right to demand the highest price for that commodity—that wear of brain and brawn that fills the earth with riches. They find the best market and the highest prices where money is abundant and business brisk. Like agriculturists and other producers, they have something to sell. Unlike capitalists, whose money is invested at rates of interest fixed by law, which can not be changed, the prices of labor change in quick sympathy with the abundance of money and the ever-accompanying demand for labor. The claim that the gold unit, as a greater purchasing power, is a benefit to labor is a flight of ideal statesmanship that has no basis in fact, and could only rest permanently in the minds of those who know little of the toil and experiences of labor life.

Tested by experience even the days of paper money, with all its evils, yet with every brain and hand busy turning the wheels of stimulated production and industry, would be preferred by the laborer to a gold-standard period, yellowed in the withering contraction of stagnation and want. It is true then the gold unit might purchase much, but, under the palsying touch of contraction, how would the laborer get the gold unit?

Mr. Robert Goffin, the celebrated English statistician, in the London Times of February 21, 1886, admits "that the gold standard has resulted in the progressive fall of wages since its adoption, computed upon their actual purchasing power."

This admission, emphasized as it has been recently by bread riots and mobs in London and by the widespread misery and want that sit with gaunt face at the door of labor in England and Germany, the special gold-standard nations, are significant lessons that we may well study.

If suspension of silver coinage is a benefit to labor, let the answer be given why labor in the gold-standard countries is to-day most oppressed.

Germany adopted the gold standard in 1871. Each year since then nearly a quarter of a million of her laborers and farmers have left her shores and found a home in bimetallic America. So great is financial distress there that Herr Schöltz, the German minister of finance, in the Reichstag, on February 21, 1886, stated that Germany was "ready to consider measures for protecting the value of silver within its own national boundaries, if any practicable plan could be brought forward, for relieving the pressure of monometallism complained of by the farming and other land interests."

England, the other gold-standard country, is now convulsed in the throes of a great labor crisis. Her ship-yards, factories, and foundries are nearly all idle. Many of her best financiers charge this stagnation to monometallism.

At a recent meeting of the International Monetary Standard Association in London, Mr. Greenfield, governor of the Bank of England, Mr. Samuel Montague, the head of the greatest banking house in London except that of the Rothschilds, and Mr. Thomas Sutherland, the great Greenock ship-owner, urged a return to the double standard, and the latter strongly denounced the gold standard as the chief cause of the world-wide depression in trade.

Pinched by dire distress, compelled to look these alarming conditions in the face, the wiser financiers of England are turning away from the mistake of monometallism and looking for relief to the remonetization of silver again.

In the light of these experiences it has been fitly said that "the silver advocates at Washington are fighting the battle of labor all over the world."

The nations of Europe that, like the enthusiastic member from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], thought gold was king, and like the Israelites of old made unto themselves a golden calf and fell down and worshiped it as their supreme financial deity, are learning the lesson that there is safety in the old ways and are eager to find their way back again into the beaten track of bimetallism.

It is a significant fact that this battle for the wage-earner is specially urged by Wall street syndicates, banks, bondholders, and capitalists, and chiefly by those who toil not themselves. Their anxiety is aroused for labor, and for this purpose they are unwilling that silver shall be coined and money become abundant and cheap upon the assumption that they would have labor paid in gold. They object to the payment of labor in the silver dollar of 371¼ grains of pure silver, but with one accord insist upon the coinage and circulation of the subsidiary silver coin of half-dollar, quarter-dollar, dime, and half-dime denominations which have only 345⅜ grains of pure silver in the dollar, or about 26 grains less than the standard dollar. Of this subsidiary coin there is now in circulation in the United States the sum of $75,034,111, and with this coin the labor of the country is quite uniformly paid.

Then what a sham is this objection to the coinage of the silver dollar? From their standpoint it is not honest to coin and use the 371¼-grain silver dollar in payment of the national and individual debts and bonds, but it is honest to coin and use in payment of labor that which has 26 grains less of pure silver in the dollar.

Need I say their theory is a gold standard for all, their practice cheap silver for labor, dear gold for their larger transactions, and gold made dear by this very exclusion of silver? The success of that theory depends on the supposed ignorance in the masses of laborers of the simplest economic principles.

This tender care of the wage-worker, and the proposed betterment of his condition by making money scarcer and higher, looks like a huge joke in which American capitalists were experimenting upon the qualities of our national humor.

But there is a pathetic side to this humor, voiced in the piteous destitution of the laborers of Europe now groaning under the gold-standard system, that may well check unseemly experiments and stay the consummation of like results here. Until the laborer complains that he is injured by the superabundance of silver dollars, and has more than he can profitably use, is it not amazing that capitalists should expend so much energy in this self-assumed and vicarious work?

SCALING DEBTS OR REPUDIATION.

It is objected that further coinage of silver dollars will result in scaling public and private debts, which is repudiation and dishonor. This is the key to the situation, and states the real question on the side of capital. The lender fears the effect upon his securities. The labor mask now drops from the financial face, and natural features are disclosed.

Every honest man instinctively shrinks from repudiation of his debts, and our people pride themselves on honestly meeting national obligations.

This position is therefore adroitly taken. It shows the masterly hand of the wary and all-powerful moneyed interests, which in the past have so molded legislation that lands, stocks, money, and wealth have in constant course passed from the many to the few, and by which colossal individual fortunes have been largely creatures of legal enactment.

This is the old battle-cry. Is it true?

Would either public or private debts be repudiated or scaled by payment in the dollar of 371¼ grains of pure silver.

THE PUBLIC DEBT

was created by acts of Congress, which prescribed the conditions of the respective loans and the kind of money in which they were payable.

Act of February 25, 1862, authorized what were known as 5-20 bonds. The interest was payable in coin.

The loans under acts of February 17, 1862; July 11, 1862; March 3, 1863, $900,000,000; March 3, 1864, $200,000,000; June 30, 1864, $400,000,000, were all payable in coin. The loan under act of March 3, 1865, $600,000,000, was payable in coin or other lawful money—that is, greenbacks.

In all these acts coin, not gold, was prescribed. The silver dollar was a coin and full legal-tender with gold all this time.

In the stress of civil war both gold and silver disappeared from circulation, and was locked in the public Treasury, in the vaults of banks, and were articles of merchandise among brokers. Paper money flooded the country. In 1864 a dollar in gold or silver was worth from 151 to 285 cents in paper.

The Government bondholder was receiving payment of interest in gold and silver coin; labor was paid in paper. The bondholders, ever a power, fearing their bonds would be paid in paper, procured the passage of the act of Congress of March 18, 1869, which was "An act to strengthen the public credit, to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the law by which such obligations had been created," and pledged "the faith of the United States to the payment of all United States notes not bearing interest in coin or its equivalent," also all interest-bearing obligations.

In every act coin, that is, gold and silver, was scrupulously prescribed. Therefore, by the very terms of his contract, the public creditor agreed to take either gold or silver, then full legal-tender coin, in payment of the debt. It is so nominated in the bond, and more may not be asked.

It is conceded as a matter of law that such creditor is bound by his contract to accept payment in silver if the Government shall so elect.

Just here the creditor interposes the plea of equity, and asks to be paid in gold—

First. Because while the debt was being created the silver dollar was not in circulation, although a legal coin, and therefore he was induced to believe coin meant gold.

Second. Because the silver dollar is not a dollar, but only 80 cents, and by such payment he would lose 20 per cent. of his debt.

The answer is not difficult.

First. While the debt was being contracted both silver and gold had disappeared from circulation. The creditor was remitted to the law which prescribed both silver and gold. Much of the debt in part represents only 50 cents in the dollar. It was based not on coin but on paper money, then the current money in value.

Second. The plea that the creditor would only get 80 cents on the dollar of his debt is without basis. The silver dollar is exchangeable for gold and is now its equivalent.

Dr. J. Lawrence Laughlin, professor of political economy in Harvard University, a gold standard advocate, and who has written the most comprehensive and exhaustive treatise on bimetallism I have seen, says in his work that—

> The highest justice is rendered by the state when it exacts from the debtor at the end of the contract the same purchasing power which the creditor gave to him at the beginning of the contract; no less, no more.

Then, if the silver dollar was not exchangeable with the gold, measured by the rule above laid down by Professor Laughlin, it will not be denied that the bullion in the silver dollar will purchase as much of the necessaries of life as the bullion in the gold dollar would have done when the debts were contracted.

Discard silver; use gold only. The public debt would by that act be increased 20 to 30 per cent. by the loss of that quantity of silver coin in circulation. Labor and labor products have admittedly depreciated 50 per cent. Our public debt, now reduced numerically one-half, under such conditions would be potentially as large as before a dollar was paid. Measuring as we must by our only means of payment, labor and its products. Gold is a decreasing quantity, and with it as the sole measure of value, each year we should find prices lower, gold higher, the prices of all commodities shrinking to meet its shrinking quantity.

The product of silver and gold in the world from 1850 to 1883 is shown in the following table:

Year.	Silver.	Gold.	Total.
1850	$36,826,900	$131,270,000	$168,096,900
1856	37,611,300	136,940,800	174,552,100
1866	55,654,300	127,538,600	183,192,900
1878	98,882,177	119,092,786	213,974,963
1881	102,168,354	103,023,078	205,191,432
1882	109,952,251	98,699,588	208,651,839
1883	114,217,733	94,027,901	208,245,634

The product in the United States in the same period was:

Year.	Silver.	Gold.	Total.
1850	$50,000	$50,000,000	$50,050,000
1856	50,000	55,000,000	55,050,000
1866	10,000,000	53,500,000	63,500,000
1878	45,000,000	51,206,360	96,487,745
1881	43,000,000	34,700,000	77,700,000
1882	46,800,000	32,500,000	79,300,000
1883	46,200,000	30,000,000	76,200,000

The value of property in the United States in the same period was, real and personal: 1850, $7,135,780,288; 1860, $16,159,616,068; 1870, $30,068,518,507; 1880, $43,642,000,000.

These tables show that the production of gold is gradually but regularly and certainly decreasing—in the United States, from $50,000,000 in 1850 to $30,000,000 in 1883; in the world, from $131,270,000 in 1850 to $94,027,901 in 1883. That silver in like manner is gradually but certainly increasing in quantity—in the United States, from $50,000 in 1850 to $46,200,000 in 1883; in the world, from $36,826,900 in 1850 to $114,217,733 in 1883. That the two metals together have kept at quite an uniform aggregate, being, in the United States, $50,050,000 in 1850, $76,000,000 in 1883; in the world, $168,096,900 in 1850, $208,245,634 in 1883, showing a gradual but uniform increase, but in the aggregate not equal to the marvelous increase in the value of property, which in the United States increased from $7,135,780,288 in 1850 to $43,642,000,000 in 1883.

These tables show conclusively that in the last fifteen years the production of silver and gold has become relatively settled. Neither is subject to great fluctuations. The product in each is regular and accurately measurable—gold a decreasing, silver an increasing factor, the two keeping an equilibrium, but lagging in the race with increase of wealth of which they are the measures.

It follows from these facts that payment in the silver dollar will not scale the public debt, but would give a fair equivalent for that which was received. All legislation since 1860, except the Bland act of 1878, has operated in favor of capital and the lending classes.

Debts created in paper money at 50 cents on the dollar, and payable in paper, have been made payable in gold and silver coin of 100 cents on the dollar.

In the same direction we are now asked to discard one of the constitutional coins of the country that has the lowest relative bullion value and compel the payment of the debt in the coin of highest bullion value, and which will be made much more valuable by the very fact of such demonetization.

It is a significant fact that the very men who are so specially sensitive on the score of silver debt-paying repudiation, have almost uniformly voted against the redemption of the trade-dollar, which was a repudiation of honest debt that is an abiding stain upon our national reputation.

PRIVATE DEBTS,

if paid in silver dollars, would be paid not only in a fair equivalent, but in many instances in the same kind of money in which the debt was created. It is estimated that one-half, at least, of private debts now existing have been incurred since the Bland act has been in force, and in contemplation of its provisions.

To provide now that the silver dollar which the debtor got as a loan shall be drawn out of circulation, the debt made payable in gold, thereby increased one-fourth, with his ability to pay decreased 50 per cent. would be a monstrous financial crime. Yet this is the proposition. Under the guise of protecting national and individual credit and honor we would add unbearably to the burdens of the people. Soon the inevitable result would come: the lender must take the debtor's property, which the law will have made him unable to redeem.

The continuance of silver-dollar coinage will therefore scale no debt, public or private, while discontinuance will increase the money stringency and stay the advancing tide of prosperity.

BENEFIT FROM SILVER COINAGE.

Three-fourths of the people are debtors. Most men mortgage the future. Wise credit stimulates industry and promotes vital growth. Under the present bimetallic system our people have purchased factories, farms, and homes, and reasonable mortgages and incumbrances have been placed upon their properties. Business enterprises have been entered upon in like faith in the future and on a stable financial policy. Change that basis now, cut off one source of coin supply, and all this property shrinks in exact proportion.

It is claimed by monometallists that speculators alone benefit by such coinage.

Mr. Bayard, in the speech heretofore referred to, uses this language:

So I say, considering the great fact that each man in the community sustains the relation of creditor as well as of debtor, that if he can pay his debts in this depreciated money he will be paid himself in the same money, nothing can be made of it, that I can understand, excepting that a class of people who, having purchased property at exaggerated prices and finding it now shrinking in value, may have an opportunity of scaling their debts to the injury, the injustice of their creditors.

Mr. GRAY iterates the same thought, in markedly similar language, in 1886. In his speech in the Senate he says the persons who will be benefited "are largely those who have embarked in speculative enterprises, those who have bought land for which they could not pay. Now that these men, or some of them, should see a present advantage in scaling the debts they have incurred and repaying only 80 per cent. of the borrowed capital with which they have sought to become capitalists themselves, I can readily imagine."

The monometallists have quite uniformly made similar charges. Speculators and every honest debtor share alike in the abundance of money which tends to keep all property on a fair average, and are all condemned in this sweeping manner if they advocate such financial measures as shall avail to equalize and make stable the price of lands and all other property.

The reasoning is unsound. Continued coinage of silver, so long as one dollar is exchangeable for another, does not furnish depreciated money but gives a sound currency, and by just equivalence provides coin ratably keeping pace with the increase of wealth, and a fair ratio between wealth and its metallic measure. It is the purpose of such coinage to keep this uniform and equal ratio between them.

Silver coinage benefits not the speculator alone but every laborer, every mechanic who has bought a home for his family, every farmer who has purchased a homestead, and every business man who relying on just legislation in the interest of labor and industry, as well as capital, has builded upon the future in prudent debt that he might procure on credit a home, a farm, a business that should not be legislated out of his hands under pretended promises of protecting his financial honor.

Stop silver coinage; let gold continue to decrease; let houses, farms, business, and products of labor continue to increase in normal ratio as heretofore, then measure them by this diminishing gold supply only; the result is apparent.

No one will buy land which is thus constantly growing less in value, or engage in business when his plant and stock uniformly shrink up from day to day, when, notwithstanding his added toil and labor, the debt grows, while the means of payment diminish simply because the the supply of money does not keep even pace.

These debts have been contracted on the basis of gold and silver supply. Take away silver coins, one-fourth of our coin circulation, and every debtor would be compelled to pay 125 cents for every dollar he had borrowed. Every mechanic who had bought a house for $1,000 and mortgaged it for $750 would by this course find all margin on his property swept away, and the mortgage by law made as large as the house. So with every honest debtor whose lands or business was encumbered in like manner. Would it largely add to his comfort to know that the lawmaker was consulting only the financial interest and credit of the debtor in the course suggested?

Even with the abundance of coin, the farmer gets to-day but 80 cents per bushel for wheat, 40 cents for corn, 10 cents per pound for cotton; the laborer, from 50 cents to $1 per day for work, if he can get work at all.

Demonetize silver, and how much lower will these prices go? When will the bottom be reached?

It may be safely said that the classes that will be benefited by the coinage of silver are the toilers everywhere—the producers and the debtors. The latter are estimated at three-fourths of the heads of families in the United States. In their prosperity speculators might share. Capital also would find its truest advancement in such abundance of coin. On the other hand, speculators and gamblers would find their choicest fields of labor in the financial contraction and ruin that would accompany the demonetization of silver.

GOLD STANDARD PROPHECIES.

In the exhaustive debates in the two Houses of Congress when the Bland act was under discussion in 1878 the opposers of silver coinage prophesied the evils that would follow such course. In the light of eight years' experience let us examine these predictions.

1. It was said cheap silver will drive gold out of the country. In 1878 we had in circulation in the United States $200,000,000 in gold; we now have $600,000,000. In that prediction it was forgotten that there was such a thing as balances in trade.

2. Cheap labor, it was urged, would open an era of wild speculation, in which prices would reach paper-money standards; that the laborer's cheap dollar would buy but few of the necessaries of life.

The silver dollar to-day has a larger purchasing power than at at any time in the last half-century.

3. It was said our national credit would be impaired and Government securities fall in price.

Government credit to-day is firmer and the price of her securities relatively higher than ever before in our history; yet for eight years the Mint has been coining this demoralizing standard dollar at the rate of over $2,000,000 monthly.

We are met by the counter-prediction of bimetallists in this debate that such coinage would equalize the bullion value of the gold and silver dollar. This it is alleged has not been realized. There are manifest reasons for this last failure.

The Government, since 1878, has constantly discriminated against the silver dollar. Dishonored and kept out of circulation, she can not complain that others look with suspicion on the child she disowns. The growing scarcity of gold has operated in the same direction. Capitalists here combined for the same purpose. So zealous were the New York banks in this direction, that to keep the Government from issuing six millions of standard silver dollars they volunteered to advance that amount in gold and take subsidiary silver coins, although the latter contained 156,000,000 grains, or $420,000 less pure silver than that amount in silver dollars.

The silver dollar was not used in purchasing silver bullion, nor in payment of the public debt, but was suffered to accumulate in the Treasury, and this very accumulation was used as an argument against its coinage; yet the silver dollar circulates as freely from hand to hand and much more acceptably than the boasted tiny gold dollar, and the chief inquiry among the millions outside of the Treasury buildings is how they shall get an adequate supply of the rejected silver dollar.

The people of the South and West, especially, and the bread-winners everywhere, are asking for more money to meet the exigencies of their marvelous growth. They do not complain at the silver dollar, but are eager to exchange for it their corn, wheat, cotton, and labor. All that is needed is a settled financial policy. Let the people be assured that it will be gold and silver as heretofore, equal in measure with national increase in wealth, and soon the busy hum of renewed industry will be heard again.

¶ There are in circulation in the United States about $4 in silver and $6 in gold to each of its 60,000,000 people. If we should continue to coin silver for twenty years at the rate now authorized by law, we would only have in circulation $13 in silver to each inhabitant if the population remained stationary, but with the natural increase in population only about $8 or $10 each. The average American would not feel burdened by such amazing wealth nor complain at the weight or fineness of his silver dollars.

France to-day has in circulation $14 in silver and $23 in gold to each inhabitant, and keeps the coins at par with each other, with less pure metal in her silver coins, relatively, than we have in our silver coin. Other European nations are not far behind France.

In view of these facts the fright of the American financial statesman at our silver coinage, even if all our domestic silver bullion was coined each year, is an amazing specimen of financial posing.

What course is wisest is a question that meets every one in dealing with our financial condition to-day.

I would say—

First. Redeem at once and unconditionally all trade-dollars outstanding at par in standard silver dollars and coin them into like standard coins.

Second. Continue the coinage of the silver dollar under the present system until under a fair test we reach the limit of its capacity to circulate equally with the gold dollar coin.

Third. Use every dollar as it is available in the Treasury, in excess of the $100,000,000 reserve fund, in payment of the public debt, that our burdens may be lessened, and that the tax-gatherer may have rest.

Fourth. As legal-tender notes are returned into the Treasury, replace them with gold and silver certificates, based upon coin, and in such denominations as may best serve commercial uses.

Fifth. Substitute these certificates for national-bank notes as fast as the payment of our national debt necessitates the withdrawal of such notes from circulation.

This certainly would insure stable paper currency. Every silver dollar would be represented in circulation and would be material and active factors in our financial development.

THE WAR UPON SILVER

is in the interest of capital, and has partaken of much of the asperity of the initial contest in 1878. Then the people demanded the restoration of the silver dollar, which had been fraudulently demonetized in 1873. Organized capital and Federal patronage were then held as threats over the heads of Congress.

The New York Tribune of January 7, 1878, contained this threat:

The President knows that men can be held true to Republican pledges as to finance, if they know that their truth means favor as to appointments.

In its issue of January 10, 1878, was this threat:

The capital of the country is organized at last, and we shall see whether Congress will dare fly in its face.

The idea that gold was king, and omnipotent in finance, had bred insufferable intolerance. Congress answered this insult by the passage of the Bland bill over President Hayes's veto by more than a two-thirds vote. Like threats insidiously propagated now would provoke like reply. The Representatives of the people, many of them elected upon this issue, will brook no indignities.

Happily we have a President who, while noted for his decisive views on this subject of silver coinage, is equally noted for a manly respect for the opinions of others, one who deals in open and manly methods, one who scorns the tricks of indirection and contemns the sycophant who crooks the preguant hinges of the knee that thrift may follow fawning. In this regard no man has clearer skirts than he.

I deprecate this war upon silver. I believe it to be unwise even from the standpoint of the capitalist. It serves no good purpose, but continues the stagnation now so oppressive. In our country there can be no financial king, no autocratic measure of value and equivalent of exchange that shall exclude all others. Such may find a home where crowned heads dominate subjects, but not where the people rule.

The money-changers of our great cities cry out lustily and make proclamation that "gold is king," and occasionally an enthusiastic worshiper in these Halls echoes the cry. The gilded monarch with coronet on his brow trembles at the response, welling up from the toiling masses like the voice of the mighty deep, and voiced in the answer, "Gold have we none; silver is our heritage."

Silver has been the wage-earner's portion in all the past, and gold the portion for dainty fingers to fondle and dandle. So it will ever be.

Together gold and silver constitute the financial dualism, part of the dualism all about us in the material world, operating in the divine economy the highest developments of national civilization and growth. Divorce them, and financial disaster is the necessary result.

Gold and silver like capital and labor find their highest uses and best results when combined in equal and just relation, each contributing to the stability and usefulness of the other.

With gold and silver passing from our mints as heretofore into the avenues of trade and business, the pulse of healthy industrial life may soon beat strongly again.

We may rest content with coins which are coeval with our birth, and have served us faithfully for a nation's age, though the wise men of this generation may call them frauds. If so content, capital and labor, the husband and wife of wealth, will soon see that their nimble children, toil, busy thrift, and economy, shall light anew the fires of industry all over the land. The people have willed that silver shall abide with us. Let the Treasurer provide the houses needed for her reception and continuance. They have concluded to take experience, and not speculation, as their financial guide. [Applause.]

Mr. HALSELL. Mr. Speaker, the agitation of the suspension of the coinage of the standard silver dollar has excited an interest in the minds of the people throughout this country almost unparalleled in her financial history. Apprehensions are indulged by the great mass of the people that if the coinage of the silver dollar is stopped there will be widespread ruin and desolation. On the other hand, there are those equally honest who believe that unless there is a suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar and gold alone made the standard untold woes and misery will ensue. In this divided sentiment it is of the highest importance that we, as the representatives of the people in the national Congress, should look well into the merits of this question and act wisely in its solution.

We shall be held to a strict accountability for our action on this subject. There is no subject of greater importance to any country than to provide a safe, sound, and reliable currency, and to no question has there ever been given more earnest and patient thought by financiers and statesmen. The prosperity and happiness of the people depend upon a proper solution of it. The light of past experience offers a very safe guide for the future, and the people of the United States, who are ever jealous of their rights, in the light of that experience spoke through their Representatives on this floor in the Forty-eighth Congress in no uncertain sound, and are to-day emphasizing that statement.

They are watching with intense interest the action of their representatives on this subject, so vitally important to their weal or woe.

They have said that they are opposed to the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar. Shall we heed their voice or shall we disregard their wishes and their interest and legislate still in the interest of those who are seeking further to enrich themselves off the working classes of this country? This is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, and when they speak let their servants take heed.

They desire that the money which has been used from the beginning of the Government to the present time shall be let alone. It was their first love. It has brought them through thus far in glorious triumph, and although there have been efforts made at different times to win their affections from it those efforts have been unsuccessful, and they cling with increasing tenacity to the gold and silver as a double standard; and to-day the currency, gold, silver, and paper money, is answering all the demands of the country, and that much abused silver dollar, which is claimed by monometallists to be a sham and a fraud, will buy as much sugar, coffee, and clothes for the wives and children of the poor man as the gold or paper dollar.

But we are told now as we have been told before that the continued coinage of the silver dollar will appreciate gold and depreciate silver, and upon this theory, baseless as I believe, we are asked to strike down one of the metals which has stood the test of ages, and since the beginning of our Government has been a safe, reliable, and convenient money for the great body of the people of this country. The people have not forgotten the panic of 1873, which came upon the country just at the time when silver was demonetized and gold was made alone the standard, and which continued until 1878, when the Bland bill was passed restoring the silver dollar to its former standard of fineness and weight and authorized the coinage of an amount not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of bullion per month. Almost immediately on the passage of that bill restoring the silver dollar to its ancient uses confidence was restored, and the energies of the people, which had been paralyzed, were again vitalized, and all branches of industry received a fresh impetus. Is there no significance in this coincidence?

In the very beginning of this Government and when we started out on the grand experiment of self-government the question arose, as one of the most important subjects touching her financial welfare, as to what legislation was necessary and ought to be enacted to carry out the provisions of the eighth section of the Constitution, which confers on Congress the power to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures. After a most careful and patient investigation, by some of the ablest statesmen who have ever graced the halls of the National Congress, it was determined that gold and silver should be the measure of values, and under that power given Congress by the Constitution, to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the power conferred upon Congress, an act was passed at the first session of the Second Congress, approved April 2, 1792, authorizing the establishing of a Mint. By the fourteenth section of that act, any person or persons could bring to said Mint gold and silver bullion in order to be coined, and the bullion so brought was there to be assayed as speedily as may be after the receipt thereof, and free of expense to the person or persons by whom the same was brought.

By the sixteenth section of said act it was provided "that all the gold and silver coins which shall have been struck at and issued from said Mint shall be a lawful tender in all payment whatsover. Those of full weight according to the respective values hereinbefore declared, and those of less than full weight at values proportional to their respective weights," and it was further provided by said act that the silver dollar should contain 371¼ grains of pure silver and the gold dollar to contain 24¾ grains of pure gold. It was further provided by the eleventh section of said act "that the proportional value of gold to silver in all coins which shall by law be current as money within the United States be as 15 to 1, according to quantity or weight of pure gold or pure silver," which were the relative values until 1834, when it was changed from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1.

The present weight of the standard gold dollar is 25.8 grains, 23.22 fine gold and 2.58 grains alloy; and 412½ grains of standard silver constitute the silver dollar, and 412½ grains of standard silver was the lawful-tender dollar from 1792 until 1873. At the latter date it was suddenly discovered by certain persons that Jefferson, Hamilton, and other eminent statesmen were mistaken, and that the standard silver dollar was a fraud and a cheat, and that its coinage ought to cease and it held as a relic of barbarism. Who made this wonderful discovery, and how did it happen?

The late war between the States, which was one of the most terrible wars which has affected any country in modern times, left the Government with a debt of over two and one-half billions—the exact amount on the 31st day of August, 1865, $2,845,907,626. On the 1st day of July, 1873, the unmatured interest-bearing bonded debt of the United States was $1,695,805,950, and in the hands of the bondholders. They knew that if they could procure legislation to debase the silver dollar and thus strike down one-third of the legal-tender coin money of this country that gold would appreciate in value, and that the bonds which they hold, principal and interest, would be paid in this appreciated currency. They set out to accomplish this purpose. These shylocks claimed that it was dishonest in the Government to pay them in anything but gold. Notwithstanding, when they purchased the bonds the money used for that purpose was legal-tenders, worth 50 cents on the dollar in coin, and notwithstanding that legal-tenders should be receivable at their face value for all debts, public and private, except interest on the public debt and certain dues, and so indorsed on their back. This demand was unreasonable, outrageous, and unjust.

Their first demand was to have their bonds paid in coin, gold and silver. This demand was acceded to and in 1869 an act was passed by a Republican Congress against the protest of the Democrats that they would be paid in gold and silver. To meet still further their demands the act of 14th July, 1870, was passed extending the time of payment, reducing the rate of interest and expressly exempting the new bonds from taxation, State, Federal, or municipal, and as a part of its obligation there was printed on each bond "that it shall be paid in coin of the standard value prescribed by law on the 14th July, 1870," and at last the act approved the 12th February, 1873, met their highest ambition changing the standard from gold and silver to gold alone.

In this act approved 12th February, 1873, revising and amending the laws relative to mints, assay offices, and coinage of the United States the silver dollar is not mentioned, but provides for a trade-dollar to contain 420 grains of standard silver. It was not intended that the trade-dollar was to circulate in the United States, but was meant to circulate in China to answer the purposes of our trade with that country. It has been charged, and not successfully denied, that, there being no mention made of the silver dollar in the act of February 12, 1873, some person or persons unknown, at the time the commissioners were revising the statutes of the United States, inserted the following: "The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for an amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment." It is said that this revised volume of the statutes being large was adopted by Congress in 1874 without being read, upon assurances given by the commissioners that they had not inserted any new legislation. A few months after the adoption of the Revised Statutes it was discovered to the great horror of the country that the silver dollar had been demonetized. An indignant and outraged people spoke through their representatives on this floor and demanded a restoration of the standard silver dollar; and on the 28th of February, 1878, an act was passed "to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character."

Although this act did not restore the law of 1792 so far as the unlimited coinage of the silver dollar was concerned, yet the Secretary of the Treasury by this act being authorized to purchase not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 of silver bullion per month for coinage, and making the silver dollar a legal tender for any amount, checked the decline of silver, and from that day until the present the same dollar of the Constitution of 412½ grains of standard silver has been in the hands of the people with a purchasing power as great as a gold or paper dollar, and will continue to possess that power if the spirit of the provisions of section 3694 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is complied with, which provides that "the coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund and shall be applied as follows:"

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.
Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set aside as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.
Third. The residue to be paid into the Treasury.

Sir, are the terms of that law indefinite and uncertain? Does coin mean gold alone? If Congress had intended it to mean gold alone gold would have been used instead of coin; yet that law is a dead letter, and in the face of it gold alone has been used exclusively in payment of the interest and principal of the bonds for many years past. The bondholder, however, as I have shown by the various acts of legislation, is emboldened to ask now for legislation to demonetize silver that his bonds may surely be paid in gold. This accomplished, his wealth will be greatly increased, while the debtor class, mostly poor men, will have their burdens increased. Additional sweat and labor of the toiling millions will have to be expended to procure the necessaries of life and pay the interest on the bonds held by the rich exempt from taxation. Already their burdens are most grievous to be borne on account of the iniquitous protective tariff, which has cursed the country for many years.

Sir, the millions who work on the farm, at the forge, and in the mines are to be the sufferers. Their hard earnings are asked to be added to the riches of the rich, while they will be impoverished. I do not mean to say that I do not want the bondholder to be protected; but, on the contrary, I want him to have what justly and legally belongs to him; I want him paid every dollar, principal and interest, of his bonds, according to the contract—nothing more; nothing less—but I do most solemnly protest against that character of legislation which enriches the rich and at the same time impoverishes the poor.

This grand Government of ours, which is the pride of every true American heart, was organized to mete out even-handed justice to all her citizens. It was intended by the framers of this Government that the citizen should be protected, not only in his life and liberty, but his property as well.

Let us, Mr. Speaker, in the spirit of our institutions protect the poor as well as the rich of this great country. Let us so legislate for the people that all, rich and poor, when they look upon that grand old flag as it waves in triumph from one end of this country to the other feel that beneath its ample folds there are equal rights to all and exclusive privileges to none.

Sir, it is a lamentable fact that the legislation of this country for twenty years has centered almost the entire wealth of this nation in the pockets of a few. I shall not complain if, under the laws, just and equal to all, there are those who by their energy and financial sagacity have accumulated wealth. That is commendable, and no one has a right to complain; but I do complain of that kind of legislation which for many years past has favored the rich at the expense of the poor. The proposition to suspend the coinage of the silver dollar is of that character of legislation.

I am unwilling as one of the Representatives of the people on this floor to see such an iniquity perpetrated without entering my protest. There can be no doubt if the coinage of the silver dollar is suspended the value of gold will be increased, and as a necessary consequence a greater amount of the products of labor will be required to pay debts. It would be a most flagrant violation of the contract, and the debtor classes would be the sufferers from that violation. Their debts were contracted with reference to the law which existed at the time of their creation. The striking down of the coinage of silver would destroy over one-third of the coin money of the United States, and to that extent would bring about a contraction of the currency. Have we more money than the commerce of the country requires? Let us see.

By the last report of the Director of the Mint it appears that the specie and paper currency of the United States was, on the 1st day of July, 1885, $1,845,005,156, but this does not represent the amount in circulation. There is of that amount only about $1,000,000,000 in circulation. Assuming the population of the United States to be 60,000,000, and that is about correct, we have per capita $16.66⅔, $37.80 less than France, and $8.41 less than Great Britain. Is that amount of money per capita too much? I presume that no one will argue that it is unless it be the banker or bondholder. Is there an inflation of the currency? Is there a fictitious value on property which always results from an inflation of the currency? No, sir; but on the contrary the fact that our hogs, cattle, and other articles of food are cheaper than they have been for many years past, paying but little if anything beyond the cost of production, is evidence that there is not more money in circulation among the people than the demands of trade require. The money to make up this amount is gold, silver, and paper, all of equal purchasing power.

Now, sir, the inevitable consequence of stopping the coinage of the silver dollar would be to destroy the purchasing power which it now has and to lessen the volume of the currency to the amount at least, according to the present rate of coinage, $27,000,000 per annum. Not only so, but the paper currency is constantly diminishing and no increase in gold, while the population is increasing over 1,000,000 per annum and the business of the country is growing and extending all the time. Where, sir, I ask, is the money to meet this growing demand to come from if the coinage of the silver dollar is suspended?

Mr. Speaker, if the bondholders and bankers succeed in their demands, and gold alone is the measure of values, bankruptcy and ruin will ensue. Such a spectacle of wretchedness and misery has never been seen in any country as would be presented here. The Government, State, municipal, corporate, and individual debts amount to several hundred million dollars, and most of them are bearing interest and must be paid; and yet in the face of these facts it is proposed to strike down the silver dollar and thus increase these debts and stop the industries of the country.

Hon. William M. Evarts, who was one of the United States commissioners at the international monetary conference held in Paris, in 1881, said:

As there never had been a time in history when silver and gold had not been necessary and been used as money, or when their united strength was more than adequate for the unfolding progress of society, so above all things in this age and in the actual circumstances of the world was this true.

Ex-Senator Thurman, of Ohio, that distinguished patriot and statesman, who was also one of the commissioners at the conference in Paris in 1881, said:

I believe that bimetallism will ultimately prevail. I can not see how the vast structure of credit, the most distinguishing feature of modern industry and commerce, can be supported on a gold basis alone. With both metals its base has often been found too narrow; but with one it would be, to my apprehension, positively unsafe.

These declarations were made by statesmen looking to the interest of the whole people. The interest of the eleven millions of people engaged in agriculture, manufactures, mechanics, and mining was taken into consideration. The contrast, Mr. Speaker, is most striking between patriotic declarations like these from the elevated plane of statesmanship and the great outcry which the bankers, bondholders, and creditors generally are making against the continuation of bimetallism. Those declarations were made in view of the fact that the suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar would result in a contraction of the currency, increase the purchasing power of gold, and that the laboring men would get at least one-third less for the products of their labor than they now get.

It is very apparent, Mr. Speaker, why the national banks favor the demonetization of silver. On the 1st of July, 1885, as is shown by the Director of the Mint, there were $542,174,633 in gold in circulation in this country; of that amount, as shown by the same authority, at that date the national banks owned $65,559,947 in gold coin, $72,986,340 in gold certificates, $69,738,759 in legal-tenders, which are redeemed in gold, $23,614,000 in gold clearing-house certificates, $18,000,000 in United States certificates, equivalent to gold, making in all the sum of $250,130,471—very nearly one-half of the gold in circulation in this country. Here, sir, is the secret of their hatred of the silver dollar.

If the coinage of the silver dollar is suspended this vast amount of gold will be increased in value and they will indeed reap a golden harvest. These banks own only about $11,400,000 of the $278,000,000 of the silver in the United States. Shall we, to satisfy the greed of the banks and bondholders, depreciate this large amount of silver, most of which is in the hands of the people, who are struggling with all their might to clothe and feed their wives and children. Individuals are largely indebted to these banks. Stop the coinage of the silver dollar and depreciate silver and this debt would be largely increased—at least one-third—and the large debtor class will be completely in the power of these banks. Is it just that we should heap upon the people these additional burdens?

Sir, the effect of demonetization of silver on our export trade in many of the leading articles would be most disastrous. England for many years consumed large quantities of our wheat, being one of our best customers. Now she has turned her attention to India and Austria, where silver is a full legal tender. Before England demonetized silver it was worth in London $1.19 per ounce; now it is worth 95 cents per ounce. She produces no silver, but purchases large quantities of it to use in her trade with countries which use silver. If the coinage of the silver dollar is stopped in the United States it will be still further depreciated in countries which have adopted the gold standard, and the cheap silver will cut down the exports of this country to an alarming extent. Overproduction will result, and the grand progress which we have made in wealth and greatness will be checked.

Already we have felt the withering influence on our export trade on account of the demonetization of silver in Europe. England prefers to trade with her dependencies when she can purchase from them with cheap silver rather than pay her gold to us. She, always jealous of her rights and interests, is encouraging India in building railroads to cheapen the cost of transportation. In the last few years it has been discovered that the soil of India is as well adapted to the raising of wheat as any country in the world. It is estimated that she has 20,000,000 acres of land splendidly adapted to its culture, and her rich valleys are all the time being rendered more productive by great care and attention. According to estimates made by the Department of Agriculture she raised 252,000,000 bushels of wheat in 1884, and it is estimated that in a few years she will raise twice that amount and will become one of the largest wheat-growing countries in the world. In 1879 she exported 2,000,000 bushels; in 1880, 4,000,000 bushels; in 1883, 36,000,000 bushels.

England was largely her customer, while on the other hand the exports of the United States of that article have fallen off very largely. In 1883 there were exported $119,879,341 worth of wheat, in 1884 $75,026,678, and in 1885 $72,933,097, as is shown by the annual report on commerce and navigation. Sir, shall we by our own folly follow the example of Europe in demonetizing silver and destroy our export trade and transfer it to other countries? Sir, I am unwilling to legislate in the interest of Europe to the detriment of my own country. But we are told that unless Europe will unite with the United States and adopt a common ratio between gold and silver and establish bimetallic money we ought to stop the coinage of the silver dollar. The meaning of which is that the Government of the United States, which has grown in greatness and grandeur more rapidly than any other country in the world in the same length of time under her bimetallic currency, shall abandon the coinage of one of her metals and let Europe control her financial policy.

Sir, are we ready to thus yield up our independence and follow in the footsteps of those European countries which have tried the experiment and found it a failure. Germany in 1871 demonetized silver and made gold alone the standard of values, but the law in its practical workings is unsatisfactory to a large number of her people, and there have been lately evidences of great discontent and a large popular demonstration in favor of returning to bimetallism. The working classes in England after a long experience with gold alone as the standard are feeling very keenly the injustice to them of gold monometallism.

Indeed, many of her ablest financiers are public advocates of re-establishing bimetallism. This sentiment has been growing and extending in those countries for years, and in the near future I predict that there will be such a popular uprising among the working classes that their demands will have to be complied with and a return to the old standards. If we are firm and act wisely and continue our bimetallic currency it will strengthen and encourage those in England and Germany who are now dissatisfied with the present policy, and will cause those countries to return to the "old paths." We are also told that if the coinage of silver is continued that our country will be flooded with the cheap silver of Europe. This is another one of those deceptive statements which when the light of the facts is let in upon it vanishes like the mist before the rising sun. England, France, and Germany possess nearly all the silver in Europe. The cry now is in those countries, particularly in Germany and England, that there is not enough of the currency to meet their demands, consequently the growing sentiment which I have referred to for bimetallism. They have none to spare.

Sir, this is the wrong time for the United States to give up her policy and place herself in the condition of England and Germany. The coinage of more of our silver would do more toward preparing the way for the co-operation of European nations with us in establishing a common ratio between gold and silver and adopting bimetallism than all the commissions which could be sent to those countries.

We are told that the continuation of the coinage of the silver dollar will result in great disaster to the country, "and the laboring men and women of the land, most defenseless of all, will find that the dollar received for the wages of their toil has sadly shrunk in its purchasing power." That same prophecy was made in 1878, when silver was demonetized, and yet these persons for whose welfare so much solicitude is felt have been able to buy every day since that time as much of the necessaries of life with the silver dollar as could have been bought with the gold or paper dollar. Theories are worthless when practical tests are applied. The laboring classes, instead of being deprived of their silver, want more of it.

One of the reasons given by monometallists why the coinage of silver ought to stop is that its coinage will drive gold from the country. This is another one of their theories which the past experience of the country explodes.

Since 1878 there have been imported into this country $187,280,257 in gold more than we have exported, during which time about twenty-seven million each year of standard silver dollars have been coined, aggregating the sum of $215,759,431. France, with her five hundred and ninety-six million nine hundred thousand silver dollars, has gained in the last year $41,700,000, gold, and during the seventy years which her mints were open to the coinage of all the silver in the world her gold did not leave that country, nor was it ever at a premium in time of peace; and yet in the face of these facts, the United States having less than one-half the silver France has, we are told that unless we stop the coinage of the silver dollar gold will be driven from the country. Sir, the people of the United States have felt the influence of the demonetization of silver in Europe.

Since Germany and France have stopped the coinage of silver, gold will buy 25 per cent. more of the products of labor than it would have done before; and if the monometallists shall succeed in stopping the coinage of the silver dollar in the United States, gold will buy 25 per cent. more wheat, corn, cotton, cattle, hogs, and, indeed, all kinds of property than it now does.

Sir, is this Congress prepared to strike a death-blow to the industries of this country by stopping the coinage of silver? We are upon the threshold of an important era for practical legislation. Laws regulating our monetary values enter into and interlace every economic interest of society and government, and we should be careful how we write the statutes referring to our financial problems. Of all the questions of statesmanship, in my mind this is now the paramount one.

It concerns every man, woman, and child, and every commercial and domestic interest of this Government of sixty million people, and my judgment is not obscured when I see the ruin which will follow if we pass a law suspending silver coinage.

This vast country with its increasing interests demands the full supply now provided for, if not much more, to keep its trade and labor in a healthy condition. If we should cut it off it would be like cutting off the flow of blood in the veins and arteries of the body, for it is the life of the Government.

When we consider the spirit of communism and the disruption threatened all over the country we may well consider whether such a step as lessening our coin circulation may not be an impulse to lift the flood-gates of discontent with the millions of laboring men who will not be able to find work wherewith to buy their daily bread. In a word, it means to my mind a stagnation of trade, a paralysis of labor, and all the evils which must arise to the deranged industries of the country.

Mr. JOHN M. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, we are now confronted by one of the most important questions that has seriously engaged public attention for the last twenty years: Shall the coinage of silver be free and unlimited; shall the present law restricting its coinage remain on the statute-books, or shall silver be again demonetized? These are pertinent inquiries, and each policy has its advocates among political economists and financiers in and out of Congress.

I shall not hope, Mr. Speaker, to add aught to what has been said, but desire briefly to call the attention of the House and country to some facts in connection with the history of silver, and legislation affecting the same, and its resulting effect upon the value of commodities, reaching to the commerce of the world.

In a practical, unvarnished, and business manner I desire to present my views without effort at rhetoric and beauty of expression, or the marshaling in dress parade of glittering generalities. The question under consideration is one of widespread importance, involving the pecuniary interest of every citizen of the Republic and of all governments, and our ablest and wisest statesmen and most astute political economists differ very materially as to the proper policy to be pursued in this emergency.

We should come to some definite conclusion, and insist upon a settled financial policy, in order that the best interest of our fellow-countrymen may be subserved. The prosperity of our people depends measurably upon the solution of this question, also the development of our inexhaustible natural resources and the encouragement of agriculture and all industrial pursuits.

According to all men honesty of purpose and a patriotic desire to legislate for the common weal, I shall, with this qualified declaration, submit some thoughts that suggest themselves to me, and which, unanswered, will control my action in the premises.

It is well for us occasionally to look back and profit by the lessons of experience, and by lights thus furnished we are not infrequently enabled to see our way more distinctly.

The power and authority to make money is a governmental function, and has been so recognized, or to use the words of Tooke, "In every civilized country supplying and regulating the circulating medium is a function of sovereign prerogative." Money to possess and constitute the requirements of a medium of exchange must have representative value, and this is derived from the lawmaking power of the Government.

Our forefathers, realizing this and desiring to abandon the barter system, endeavored to effect a permanent agency of trade by conferring upon gold and silver a legal representative value in connection with their inherent value. Section 8, of the Constitution of the United States, in enumerating the powers of Congress, among other things expressly provides, "that Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and fix the standard of weights and measures."

The molders and builders of our magnificent and perfect form of Government recognized both gold and silver as money and a legal tender in the payment of debts. They are each stamped with an indelible constitutional impression as possessing the requisites of legal and representative value.

Section 10 of the organic law in outlining and prescribing the limits and powers of the States declares that "no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; grant letters of marque and reprisal; coin money; emit bills of credit; make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts," &c.

This provision of the Constitution beyond controversy recognized and established the double standard of gold and silver, and as long as the Federal Constitution remains unchanged, bimetallism is an accomplished fact. This question settled in conformity to and harmony with the unambiguous letter of the Constitution was so considered for more than two generations, and the coinage of gold and silver was free and unchallenged, until the 12th of February, 1873, when without discussion, and it is charged without the knowledge of the American Congress, there was, as is alleged, surreptitiously inserted in a lengthy act relating to the Mint sections providing for the coinage of the trade-dollar and subsidiary coinage.

This act omitted to provide for the coinage of the legal-tender silver dollar, and repealed the former law authorizing its coinage. This was a fatal blow at silver, under which it staggered and fell from its position with gold, its ephemeral dishonor having been accomplished. Trade-dollars could only be coined and fractional parts of the same, and these not to be a legal tender in sums exceeding $5. This left only silver coined previous to the passage of the act as legal tender, and this exception only continued until the revision of the statutes, June 22, 1874, when all silver coins were demonetized except as to sums not exceeding $5.

At the time of the passage of the act of 1873 the statutes were being revised by an authorized commission, proceeding under a law which did not anticipate or empower additional legislation, but merely contemplated a codification of existing laws. A provision was inserted, without warrant or authority of law, destroying the legal-tender character of the standard silver dollar. This provision will be found in the Revised Statutes, section 3386, page 708, and is as follows:

> The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender, at their nominal value, for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

This volume, consisting of more than one thousand pages and numerous statutes, was adopted by Congress in 1874, without being read, relying with implicit confidence upon the commissioners charged with its codification and arrangement, that no new legislation had been inserted. But the effect was realized and demonetization was upon us. The country perceived and felt the consequent contraction in the metallic money, the decline in prices, and the deep financial abyss into which the policy of the gold monometallists and their willing instruments had plunged the country.

The rapid fall in prices of stocks and in merchandise was serious indeed, but not comparable with the disastrous decline in real estate. Dullness of trade seemed universal. In every department of business prices were continually falling. There were no encouraging features in any trade, and we were on the crumbling brink of a fearful financial crash. This depression was caused by the fall in gold prices of commodities everywhere, the dethronement of silver and the lock-up of gold in the Treasury preparatory to specie resumption. Relief was demanded and it was imperative. There was general discontent brooding over the land; the producer, the farmer, mechanic, and laborer were being oppressed, and no one seemed thrifty and prosperous save those whose gold had been enhanced in value, and who were thus growing richer at the expense of the groans and agonies of a suffering people.

And this same class to-day, Mr. Speaker, have organized a crusade against silver, and with sycophantic hypocrisy declare they desire a single gold standard in order that the laboring man, the wage-worker, may receive full and honest compensation for his labor. Aggregated wealth, organized capitalistic power, insisting that silver must be degraded that the poor may be benefited, is a display of philanthropy never suspected of them; and it behooves us to examine the motives that induce such tender expressions.

History and our experience as a nation teaches us that the practical withdrawal of silver from circulation, and certificates issued thereon, and the establishment of gold monometallism, would produce stringency in monetary affairs and an inevitable loss to the great body of the people. Silver is the money of the great mass of society. It is constitutional, so recognized by Hamilton and Jefferson, and is a circulating medium necessary in our domestic transactions and commercial intercourse. Along with gold, each of which has performed its functions as money and a standard of value, keeping company and observing intimate relations, it comes hallowed and sanctioned by the use of years, reaching back in antiquity to "time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary," even when the morning stars first sung the young world's natal hymn.

It has stood the test of ages, and in the time of Aristotle, when the measure of commerce was the same, it possessed the requisite qualities of a just standard. The use of silver as money almost antedates the historic period and is hoary and venerable in antiquity. Its adoption as also gold was one of the first steps in civilization, and a departure from the barter system, when different representatives of value were used as a medium of exchange.

The Spartans at one time adopted iron; the ancient Romans, bars of copper, cattle, &c.; and in fact animals, skins, tobacco, corn, cowry-shells, beads, and wampum have all been used as money, possessing a purchasing power, but as civilization advanced all have given way to gold and silver, and they to-day constitute the basis of money and values. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the necessity for more money and a sound circulating medium, and the important and conspicuous services silver has performed in advancing and aiding in the national prosperity of the people, and the development of our inexhaustible resources, there are those who, forgetful of the past, would strike it from its well-earned distinction, and thus force its involuntary retirement and a scarcity of money.

But, Mr. Speaker, to return to the history of legislation and its evil consequences, we find that our fellow-citizens realized how they had been defrauded by the act demonetizing silver. They demanded the restoration of silver and that the degradation inflicted by designing politicians and capitalists should be obliterated. As a result of this, on the 28th of February, 1878, an act was passed authorizing "the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal-tender character," making it a legal tender for any amount and providing that the Secretary of the Treasury should purchase at the market price not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 of silver bullion per month for coinage. This was and is only a partial demonetization, as any limitation is detrimental. The restoration should be complete. It is a necessity.

It is absolutely certain that the business transactions of the world can not be successfully conducted with both gold and silver combined, and that we must resort to an auxiliary medium in paper. How then can it be supposed that with silver stricken from the standard of values gold alone will be sufficient as a basis? The demand for more money is increasing co-extensive with the growth of population and the extension of our settlements and the building up and development of this great country. As year by year we march toward the realization of the grand possibilities of this Republic, so steadily and surely will be apparent the necessity of an increase of our circulating medium.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the further demonetization of silver would be attended with dire misfortunes to our people, would breed discontent, reduce wages, produce contraction, paralyze industry, dwarf improvements, and practically place gold out of the reach of the great mass of our countrymen. What, sir, is to be gained by demonetization and the establishment of monometallism? To whose benefit would such legislation inure? How can the interest of the agriculturist, mechanic, laborer, and persons of limited means be promoted by the withdrawal from circulation of our silver and silver certificates, thus reducing the volume of our metal money about one-half?

Instead of bringing healing upon its wings, such legislation would be attended with fearful disaster. Even now there is a great scarcity of money, and there is universal complaint. Contraction would throw thousands out of employment, and money would be a luxury only to the opulent. The demand for work would be alarming indeed, and an increase of wages a necessity; or a repetition of strikes everywhere. The policy of the gold monometallists would close the rich mines of silver in the United States and thus deprive thousands of our miners of the results of their labor.

The same results would follow now as predicted by Mr. Hamilton, who, in his report upon the Mint in 1792, said:

> To annul the use of either of the two metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scant circulation.

The consequence would be the withdrawal of money from circulation and the hoarding of it on account of the falling in prices in all things, and an accruing profit only to the holder of money. The decline in prices robs labor of employment. It is narrowed down then to a conflict of organized capital, on the one hand, and the people on the other. It is a determination to invoke and use the power of the Government to take away from its citizens one-half of its constitutional money, which will reduce the value of labor and property and enhance the value of all evidences of debt.

Followed to its legitimate results it would virtually double the inability of the debtor class to discharge their indebtedness and correspondingly increase the amount of labor necessary to the attainment of a dollar.

As heretofore suggested, the two precious metals have been the money of the world since the beginning of commerce among civilized nations, and have occupied relative values to each other. Wherever interchange of commodities extends beyond mere localities their use becomes a necessity. They have been accepted because they possess in a higher degree than any other substance the essential qualities of indestructibility, divisibility into parts, and for their intrinsic worth. Each is money issued from the great and inexhaustible bank of Nature, which was chartered by Deity Himself, and will never suspend.

Being thus organized, silver will assert its supremacy with gold and be honest money as long as the perpetuity of our Government is assured, which all patriots hope will be until the edict goes forth, Time shall be no more. It is thus sanctioned and was recognized in the Abrahamic period as honest and lawful money. Biblical research informs us of the use of shekels of silver and the recorded and well-authenticated history of the purchase of a plat of ground "for a possession of a burying place" for Sarah who died in Kirjath-arba, the same being Hebron in the land of Canaan. The contract was for the cave of Machpelah, in "the end of the field" owned by Ephron, "and Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, 400 shekels of silver, current money with the merchant." This is the first-mentioned and authenticated record of the use of any kind of money, and goes back to and is contained in the first book of that Book inspired by Deity, and which teaches us that "in the beginning God created the heaven and the earth."

Again, it seems bimetallism was established by usage in the days of Moses, prior to his Pisgah view of the promised land, when leading the children of Israel through the wilderness. Pure gold was used in the construction of the ark, and silver and gold in the building of the altar of burnt offering. Silver was honest money then, and has steadily maintained its integrity until modern statesmanship has threatened and connived at its destruction. Through all the ages it has stood the ordeal, representing a fixed value, with purchasing power coequal with gold. Even to-day, with its weight of abuse, you can buy as much of any article for sale with a silver dollar as you can with a gold dollar.

This being undeniably true, the reasons for the organization of capital in a concentrated effort for contraction by the demonetization of silver are apparent and suggestive. It is in the interest of bondholders, who demand payment of interest in gold when the original contract was in coin, and in the interest of the wealthy as against the poorer class of people. It is an effort to the further centralization of money and wealth in a few localities and individuals, and if successful will exercise a pernicious influence upon our most vital interests. Money, like power, should not be stolen from the many and lodged in a few, but its general distribution should be encouraged.

The interest of capitalists and great corporations have monopolized enough, and too much, consideration already at the hands of the Government, and it is high time we were legislating for the good of all the people, whose safety rests in a definite policy and stable money and a faithful adherence to constitutional coin.

The silver dollar authorized to be coined by the act of April 2, 1792, consisted of 416 grains of standard silver, fineness .892$\frac{4}{10}$, equivalent to 371$\frac{1}{4}$ grains of pure silver, with 44$\frac{3}{4}$ grains alloy of pure copper. The weight of the dollar was changed by act of January 18, 1837, to 412$\frac{1}{2}$ grains of standard silver, with the fineness changed to .900, preserving the same amount of pure silver, 371$\frac{1}{4}$ grains, with one-tenth alloy.

This standard silver dollar was a legal tender when the Government debt was created, and when by the act of 1870 it was converted into a coin debt, instead of legal-tender paper, and the coinage of silver then being free, it results that the debt is based on the silver dollar of 412$\frac{1}{2}$ grains, as well as upon the gold dollar. The contract was specific, and the people who have this enormous debt to pay have a legal and moral right to demand a strict compliance with the terms of the original stipulation and the payment of said bonds in silver. It is a violation of the plighted faith of the Government to limit the coinage of silver and refuse to accept it in the discharge of existing liabilities, characterizing it dishonest money, made so, if admitted, by the act of the Government.

It is conceded that a silver dollar will purchase as much of the necessaries of life now as at any time heretofore. As compared to commodities it maintains its purchasing capacity. The demand for gold has increased with us, because of the change in the policy of Germany from a silver to a single gold standard and the suspension of silver by France and states in the Latin Union. This I submit should not induce a change upon the part of the United States. As I have stated, the refunding act provided for the payment of the public debt and interest in coin, and at that time the silver and gold dollar was the standard of value. The face of the bonds of 5 per cent. funded loan of 1881 so recognizes the fact by this inscription thereon:

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of May, A. D. 1881, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of February, May, August, and November in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes and duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

The following appears on the face of the United States 4 per cent. bond:

This bond is issued in accordance with the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, amended by an act approved January 20, 1871, and is redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after the 1st day of July, A. D. 1907, in coin of the standard value of the United States on said July 14, 1870, with interest in such coin from the day of the date hereof at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the 1st day of October, January, April, and July in each year. The principal and interest are exempt from the payment of all taxes or duties of the United States, as well as from taxation in any form by or under State, municipal, or local authority.

From this it will appear that a strict performance of the contract would suggest the payment of silver in the redemption of these obligations.

But I shall content myself, Mr. Speaker, at present, without further discussion of the good faith of the Government, and call attention to the stock of gold and silver bullion in the principal countries of the world, the population of each, and the amount of money per capita, which will demonstrate that silver alone is the measure of value in many countries. Its intrinsic value is shown to exist everywhere, and it is coextensive with gold.

I append here a table furnished by the Director of the Mint, which shows that there is not that great disparity between the volume of the two precious metals as some might imagine:

Stock of gold and silver in the principal countries of the world.

Notwithstanding the vast amount of gold and silver, it has fallen short and been insufficient to meet the demands of business as a circulating medium. Paper has been resorted to, bottomed on gold and silver or the public faith and credit. It is further a demonstrable fact that the supply of gold is gradually diminishing; and this being true, where is the philosophy or wisdom, the two being inadequate for the business, in legislating that one is sufficient? Let me invite attention to the following, taken from the report of the Silver Commission, classifying the different countries of the world in reference to metal money:

SILVER-STANDARD COUNTRIES.

Great Britain	32,000,000	Sweden	4,300,000
Canada, Cape of Good Hope and Australian colonies	7,000,000	Denmark	1,800,000
Germany	42,000,000	Portugal	4,000,000
Norway	1,700,000	Total	92,800,000

This table discloses that the strongest and most powerful nations that have adopted the single gold standard are Great Britain and Germany. In this list is found Norway, Sweden, and Denmark, which are in a measure dependencies of Germany, and Canada, Australia, and Portugal, which may be classed as dependencies of Great Britain. Narrowed down, then, but two great nationalities have adopted the single gold standard.

Of these England has been embarked in her financial policy, being monometallic gold, for about sixty-four years. Germany adopted the same policy in 1871, immediately succeeding the Franco-Prussian war. Her exactions or levies as indemnity upon France amounted to $1,250,000,000 estimated in our money; and this, coupled with the supply of silver, first suggested the change from her former silver standard to that of gold.

Prior to this, in 1857, Germany, at the suggestion of bondholders, had demonetized gold, fearing an inundation of gold from California and the Australian gold mines. Another motive for the change of base in 1870–'71, in addition to the temporary and perhaps unprecedented demand for gold, was the sudden development of rich mines of silver in the United States, from which she feared an oversupply of this metal. It is assumed by some that because of the action of England and Germany we should become alarmed and, without plausible justification, abandon our financial policy. We are assuredly far enough advanced to formulate and maintain that policy best adapted to our varied wants independent of any other government. However, let us see how the balance stands.

In an estimated population in the world of 1,049,244,456 we find that only 93,000,000 have adopted the single gold standard, while 187,300,000 recognize bimetallism by the adoption of gold and silver, and 768,744,456 adhere to an exclusive silver standard. If there be anything significant in numbers we have the consolation that the great majority of countries and peoples are in harmony as with the bimetallic system, and regard silver as constituting a part of the money of the world.

Suppose, for illustration, the world would follow the advice of the advocates of a single gold standard, it is apparent that quite one-half of the metal money would be practically withdrawn from circulation. Who can picture the fearful consequences that would inevitably follow? The hum of industry would be hushed, channels of trade would become sluggish, men and women would be thrown out of employment, and a state of idleness enforced; mills and factories closed, workshops deserted, money would be indeed scarce, and "hard times" spread like a pall over the land. It would be impossible to obtain money without exorbitant interest, and the debtor would be at the mercy of the creditor, and this in a country possessing boundless natural wealth and advantages.

Why is it impracticable to continue the bimetallic policy when the relative value of gold and silver being about 16 to 1 has been so long maintained? There are those who insist that this ratio should be changed so as to coin silver at its bullion value. This is an unfair and ungenerous proposition respecting silver, ignoring the fact that its depreciation was superinduced by the act of the Government in its demonetization and the additional fact that its coinage is now limited by law.

Mr. Speaker, instead of the weight of the lawmaking power being exerted to favor and encourage the stability and settled value of the silver dollar, it has been thrown against it in an effort to degrade its purchasing power, and this notwithstanding the United States produces about one-half of the world's supply. Self-interest should induce us to stimulate its value and encourage its production, as we are the largest producers, while India is the largest consumer of silver in the world.

Silver is decidedly more convenient than gold in small transactions and is emphatically the money of the people, and its generous supply by nature with gold has been in sufficient quantities to furnish a basis of circulation and regulate the value of all other mediums of exchange, thereby meeting the demands of the traffic of the country. It is peculiarly a "home currency," has a familiar face, and a true constitutional ring. It is the only money that finds its way to many humble homes in the land, with which they can procure the necessaries of life. It supplies the wants of the needy, feeds the hungry, clothes the naked, and carries with it confidence, sunshine, and contentment.

To demonetize it without giving relief with an abundance of some other kind of a circulating medium, would be a crime against our fellow-citizens and the best interests of the Government. It would appreciate gold and place it beyond the reach of the industrial classes, whose labor and genius build up our prosperity.

But, Mr. Speaker, we have discussed this question as one applicable to the entire world. Let us now ascertain or picture the condition of the United States if the efforts of the money centers, holders of bonds, and their allies succeed. Let us examine our status financially. In the annual report of the Director of the Mint we find the statement:

From such a revision of former estimates it would appear that the amount of coin in the country on the 1st of July, 1885, was some $820,000,000; of which $542,000,000 consisted of gold coin and $278,000,000 of silver coin.

Upon the assumption of the correctness of this statement, the Director of the Mint, on page 29 of his report, exhibits a table of the stock and ownership of gold and silver in the United States July 1, 1885, from which it appears that of gold there is in the Treasury, less outstanding certificates, $53,223,160; national banks, $165,575,867, including Treasury and clearing-house certificates; State banks, trust companies, and savings-banks, as reported to Comptroller, $25,928,757; other banks and private hands, $297,446,852. In silver coin of full legal tender and subsidiary there was a total of $95,119,065 in the Treasury, less outstanding certificates. In national banks $11,978,833, including Treasury certificates. In banks and private hands $171,726,303, aggregating the estimate. The certificates representing coin, which can only be used in their redemption, necessarily forms a part of the coin circulation.

In addition to the foregoing there was at that time in the mints and assay offices gold and silver bullion available for coinage as follows: Gold, 3,593,031.342 ounces, of the value of $66,847,095.25; silver, 4,727,076.820 ounces, of the value of $4,654,586 92.

From the same report we find our total circulation at the time stated to be as follows.

Form and location of total circulation July 1, 1885.

From this it will be observed that the withdrawal from circulation in the event of demonetization would not only be the actual coin but also silver certificates, the representative of the coin. The consequence would not only be the unsettling of values and prices, but destructive of the confidence of the citizen in the good faith and integrity of his Government, and considered an infraction of existing contracts for the payment of money, by which the value of the obligation would be enhanced. Withdraw this enormous sum from circulation, and a cry for relief will be heard welling from every quarter. It would intensify poverty and put beyond the reach of many the necessaries and comforts of life. It would wring the sweat from the face of toil without promise or hope of adequate remuneration, and poverty would be rendered more insufferable as the avenues of escape were barred.

The question of silver coinage, Mr. Speaker, is not and can not be made a local or party question. All countries are interested in the subject, and our action will have its beneficial or deleterious influence at home and stretch out through the civilized world, for the interests of all commercial nations are involved.

This is so—

Quoting from the recent speech of my honorable friend, Judge REAGAN, of Texas, whose words of wisdom should be heeded—because gold and silver have through all the ages been recognized as the money of the word, the only international money. Many nations have had bank notes and other kinds of paper money current within the countries which authorized its issue, but not current in other countries, and therefore properly designated as local money, as contradistinguished from the world's money, gold and silver. These are recognized as the world's money not because all commodities are paid for in coin, not because all exchanges of commodities are made by the aid of gold and silver, but because these measure the value of all other money in transactions between different countries and nationalities. The value of all exchange between different countries is determined mainly by the amount of metal money available for commercial use, and the value of all local money is largely controlled by the amount of metal money.

This was true at the time of the establishment of the first bank of which history gives an authentic account, being the Bank of Venice in the year 1171, and during the existence of the Bank of Genoa, established early in the thirteenth century, which is said to be the first that originated the bank note, which has since become an important factor in commercial transactions.

The Bank of Amsterdam, established in 1609, received coin bullion on deposit; and so of the Bank of Hamburg, organized in 1619 on the model of Amsterdam, and which is still in successful operation. So of the Bank of England and others, all of which have issued bank notes or drafts and paper money, yet none were considered international money, but all were bottomed on the true representatives and measure of values, gold and silver. Coming down to the year 1775, the Congress issued a large amount of bills of credit. The confederated colonies were pledged for their redemption, and the bills bore upon their face a provision which entitled "the bearer to receive Spanish milled dollars, or the value thereof in gold or silver, according to the resolution of Congress." This was local and not international money, but it had for its foundation the two precious metals.

I have said that this was not a question of financial policy affecting a single nation, but all countries. That we may realize the great importance and magnitude of the subject a recurrence to some important facts and statistics will be of interest. The national debts of the world are estimated to approximate $26,000,000,000. Excluding India, China, and Japan, with a population of about 662,000,000 and a debt aggregating about $1,100,000,000, that of the remaining countries in round numbers amounts to $25,000,000,000, as stated by Mr. STEWART in his discussion of the silver question. Other indebtedness is alleged to be twice or thrice as great, making an enormous sum that staggers credulity and is apparently beyond conception.

I mention these facts, and again call attention to the amount of international metal money in the world, which, by liberal computation, is not exceeding $7,000,000,000, constituting the basis of values, 54 per cent. of which is silver and 46 per cent. gold. The existence of these startling facts to the contrary, the advocates of a single gold standard would discard silver as a cankerous evil, and, by forcing its retirement, thereby decrease by one-half the supply of money with which this mountain of debt has to be liquidated. Is it possible that this movement is inaugurated in the interest of all the people?

Can it be to their interest to deprive them of the means of relief and correspondingly increase their inability to discharge pressing obligations? Discarding for the present the consideration of other countries, we should examine our immediate household, the United States, and her financial condition that we may have a thorough knowledge of the situation and the probable effects of legislation demonetizing silver.

In 1865, after deducting the entire amount of cash in the Treasury, our national debt on the 1st day of August of that year in round numbers was $2,756,000,000. In twenty years we have reduced the debt to $1,485,000,000, after deducting cash in the Treasury, showing in actual payment in this time of $1,271,000,000.

Mr. Grier, in his ably prepared discussion of "Our silver coinage," says:

This is a large sum. It has been a payment of over $7,250 for every hour, day and night, for twenty years. In addition during these twenty years we have paid off about $1,890,000,000 in interest on this debt. This means nearly $11,000 paid out every hour, day and night, for twenty years in interest. With all this enormous outlay * * * we are startled with the information that our debt is larger now than when we thought it was the largest, in 1865. In dollars it is smaller, but measured by cotton, or bar-iron, two of the leading products of human labor in our country, it is larger. The products of human labor to-day are so cheap when compared to the prices of 1865 in gold, that it is a fact that measured by a large number of articles the debt has increased.

And now, when a dollar is much harder to earn than in 1865, it is proposed by some to increase the difficulties by making money scarcer.

Hardly twelve months since the friends of silver in Congress made the following statement from calculation, which is considered approximately correct. The estimate was upon the controlling or market prices of 1865 and 1885, and shows that 18,000,000 bales of cotton would have paid the debt in 1865, while it would require 35,000,000 to pay it in 1885; that 25,000,000 tons of bar-iron would have been sufficient to discharge the same in 1865, while twenty years after, with the enormous reduction in amount of the sum total, it would take 30,000,000. True the debt itself has been decreased, but in a greater ratio has the facilities for payment decreased, until measured by the standard of ability to pay and the price or value of commodities we are not so able now as then.

Roundly speaking—

Says Mr. Grier—

while our debt was 100 cents in 1865 it is now reduced to 54 cents. Then, if $1 in gold in 1865 would buy no more of any article than 54 cents will now, the debt remains unreduced when measured by that particular article.

Adam Smith, who was recognized as an eminent economist, promulgated this thought, that "human labor is a more correct measure of intrinsic value than either gold or silver." While this may be true and such labor can not be used as money, still our entire debt will finally be paid by the results of human labor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, with all these suggestions and prominent features with which history is plethoric, and those from the storehouse of our national experience, the important functions of silver and its regulation of supply by nature, in conjunction with gold, in quantity sufficient to form a basis of value, adequate to the amount of trade and the exigencies of the commercial intercourse of the world, let us inquire: Why longer interpose restrictions upon its coinage? What reasons are given for depriving the people of one-half of their metallic money? Why thus force contraction, with the knowledge that financial distress will follow?

What class of individuals are interested in striking silver from our standard of value? Who is to be benefited and who injured by such legislation? Why increase the difficulties in the way of the payment of debts? Why require the laborer to work more hours to obtain a dollar than at present, thus increasing to an alarming extent his inability to support his family? In other words, why by legislative enactment demonetize silver, thus impoverishing the great body of the people and robbing them of a circulating medium in order to contribute to the wealth of the rich and the increase of their power?

I shall not attempt to answer these interrogatories, but they are suggestive of thoughtful apprehension.

Contraction is but the forerunner of a commercial crash and money panic, which will be followed by stagnation of business and general bankruptcy.

Within the past seventy years we have experienced about one dozen fearful panics, and rarely recover from one sufficiently to obtain a glimpse of prosperity before we are threatened with a recurrence. We ought, therefore, to proceed cautiously in the solution of the problem now before us, and avoid plunging the country into a sea of doubtful financial expediency. If the ultimate fate of silver is demonetization, what is to represent it as money? Gold can not, as its supply is diminishing. With 20 per cent. of our silver obliterated by depreciation, we find ourselves in the midst of business depression caused by the insidious blow at its integrity.

Senator SHERMAN, in a speech made in 1876 on the subject of the legal tender of silver coin, said:

The utter ruin that would come to mankind, especially to the poorer nations, by the demonetization of silver can not be estimated by us. Take one-half of the solid money of the world out of existence, take the sole standard of more than two-thirds of the human race, reduce it to a base metal, and the effect upon the commerce of the world would be incalculable. It can not be done; it will not be done. There is no danger of it.

These two metals have traveled side by side from the beginning of time. The records of human history do not go back to a time when they did not move together. They have varied in value, sometimes one and sometimes the other being higher; but they have gone on, gold the money of the rich, silver the money of the poor; the one to measure acquired wealth, the other to measure the daily necessities of life; and, sir, no act of Parliament, although it may disturb for a moment the relation of these two metals to each other, nothing but the act of God, can destroy the use of both of them by mankind.

Ex-Senator Thurman, the grand old Democrat, lawyer, and statesman, as a member of the commission before the international convention, said:

I believe that bimetallism will ultimately prevail, for I can not see how the vast structure of credit, the most distinguishing feature of modern industry and commerce, can be supported on a gold basis alone; with both metals its base has often been found too narrow, but with one it would be positively unsafe.

Senator VANCE, of North Carolina, who always "hits the nail square on the head," in an able and exhaustive speech delivered in the Senate on the 12th of January last, in discussing the effort of the gold monometallist, said:

Continue this attack until all the silver coin is demonetized, and a contraction is certain to ensue which will strike down prices and labor to the full extent of the proportion which silver bears to the whole volume of our money. It will prove the greatest financial calamity which has ever befallen the American people. Every species of property would shrink, the wages of the poor most of all. The only exception to this universal shrinkage would be in debts and gold. These would increase to the extent that other property decreased in value.

Suppose, for instance, that a man owed a debt of $100 which at the time the debt was made could have been discharged by 100 days' work or with 100 bushels of wheat or 1,000 pounds of cotton; if the contraction of the currency was so much as 50 per cent., then to pay this debt it would require 150 days' work or 150 bushels of wheat or 1,500 pounds of cotton. On the contrary, if when this destruction of silver money took place a man had on hand $100 in gold it would immediately become worth $150. Literally and truly the rich man would be made richer, while the poor man would be made poorer. For it is in the very nature of this kind of money-making by legislation, as in gambling, that the gains of one man must be the losses of another. It differs in this from all transactions of legitimate trade and finance, in any or all of which both parties have a voice and may be benefited. But this is a case of dead open and shut, where the debtor is bound to lose that which the creditor gains. It differs, too, from vulgar theft in that it is fraudulent in its pretenses, insidious in its methods, and lacks the courage and the candor of old-fashioned larceny.

These expressions suggest a remedy by which we may escape the threatened disaster and restore confidence, by a speedy return to the faith of the founders of the Republic, when they adopted the organic law providing for bimetallism and the unlimited coinage of both of the precious metals. Abolish discriminations, unjustly imposed, and let silver be coined into standard dollars and used under the specifications of contracts in the payment of all debts, public and private. The settled policy of the United States until recently was favorable to the free coinage of gold and silver, the wisdom of which is illustrated by history and experience. Almost the entire indebtedness of the country, national, State, municipal, and private, was created under such a policy, and the law in pursuance thereof, and each should take its chances of an extraordinary or over production of gold or silver.

The unlimited and free coinage of silver was never called in question at the time of the creation of the debts to which I have made reference. Its degradation was attempted because it was worth too much, and now that it is partially depreciated it is denominated dishonest money. Limitation upon the coinage produces depreciation to the extent of the inhibition. The effort to rob it of its value has been abortive, for its purchasing power is as great as gold. I believe that both metals are higher than if their coinage had been unobstructed.

Silver having been legislated against, and gold appreciating, made a scarcity of money, until it has almost placed it out of the power of the debtor class to meet the demands of their creditors, and hence the records of the country in every county are full of mortgages and deeds of trust, and crops not yet planted are hypothecated for supplies in order to enable the man of limited means to sustain his family until it is gathered. In the midst of plenty the people are distressed, exhausted, and poor. Nature has generously responded to the toil of the husbandman, until our granaries are full of the products of the soil. Labor has been rewarded in rich harvests. Our mechanics and artisans are vigorously at work, and every industry is strained to its utmost.

With all this, prosperity does not bless us. The true cause is the lack of a plentiful supply of money to meet our wants and give life and vigor to business. We need more money and freer coinage. We want more remunerative prices and a settled currency. Simple justice demands that as our population increases the volume of money should also; but the contrary is the case with us to-day, and corporated capital is insisting upon a further decrease, as they proclaim in the interest of the poor.

Has the millennium come indeed? When the gold interest begins to care for the poor we may expect the inauguration of that era when the lion and the lamb shall lie down together. The great mass of the people do not favor demonetization and they are here protesting against it. We should afford relief and not aggravate suffering.

Away with the suggestion as to our course measured by the policy of England. Hers has led to a concentration of money and power, and a system of landlords and tenants. The people are not prosperous. In 1822 the land-owners of England numbered one hundred and sixty-five thousand. The census shows that in 1861 the number had been reduced to about thirty thousand, with a corresponding decrease going on until now, says Mr. Berky, a celebrated writer, "one-half of the whole kingdom is owned by about twelve persons."

Let us avoid such a tendency, and keep the wealth of our nation among all the people, and not contract our money when there is prostration in business. An abundance of money sufficient to meet the demands of trade infuses activity and life in business, while contraction leads to stagnation, and is death to prosperity.

We need a liberal and just financial policy that will settle prices, restore confidence, encourage enterprise, give impetus to trade, and insure liberal and remunerative wages. The first step toward the accomplishment of this result is the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and we as legislators should not hesitate to take it at this session of Congress. [Great applause.]

Mr. FULLER obtained the floor.

Mr. JAMES. With the consent of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. FULLER] I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HALL. I ask leave to present at this time a remonstrance of Knights of Labor and other labor organizations of Burlington, Iowa, against the passage of a bankrupt law with involuntary provisions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CRISP). Unless the gentleman from New York [Mr. JAMES] withdraws the motion to adjourn the request of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HALL] is not now in order.

Mr. JAMES. I think I must insist on the motion. The gentleman's petition can be presented on Monday.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence until Friday next, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. JAMES was then agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 29, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition of Thomas Hamilton, a seaman on the United States steamer Victoria, complaining of the action of the court-martial by which he was tried during the late war, and praying that his case be referred to the Court of Claims; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a petition of the California anti-Chinese State convention, held at Sacramento, praying for relief for the Pacific coast from Chinese immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of Local Assembly No. 2960, Knights of Labor of Columbus, Ohio, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of the Western Methodist Book Concern, praying that the postage on certain pamphlets be fixed at the same rate now charged on weekly papers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Samuel Stubbs, of Bethany, Mo., late a teamster in the United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Coldwater, Ohio, praying that Marion Vangardon, dependent mother of Jacob Vangardon, late a private in Company K, Eighty-fourth Indiana Volunteers, be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of ex-Union soldiers, citizens of Watseka, Ill., praying for the passage of a bill embodying the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic in regard to pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLATT presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses, as follows:

House joint resolution No. 16.

Whereas the subject of national defense is now pending before the United States Congress; and

Whereas an effective defense not only of our cities and harbors but also of the roadsteads and estuaries upon our coast which can furnish a safe and convenient headquarters for an enemy's fleet, where hostile expeditions against our chief cities can be organized and sent forth, is of supreme importance; and

Whereas the following reasons exist why Long Island Sound would, in the event of foreign war, inevitably invite the immediate presence of a hostile fleet, and why its occupation would be a serious injury to the whole country and especially disastrous in this State, namely:

1. The sound, from its size, depth of water, and safe places of refuge, furnishes ample and exceptional advantages for the movement of a large fleet, while the coasts of Connecticut and Long Island give every facility for supplies.

2. The act of occupation of such a roadstead, a principal approach to the city of New York, would involve a severe injury to our commerce. The main rail communication between the city of New York and New England would be cut. The traffic of the sound, employing a large fleet of steam and sail vessels, transporting commodities to the value of many hundred millions a year, would be destroyed, and the shore towns of Connecticut, including four cities and a population of more than two hundred thousand, would be substantially depopulated.

3. This State, and particularly the shore towns from New Haven west, contain a large number of factories producing articles essential to the Government in time of war, and producing more than one-half of all the fire-arms and ammunition manufactured in the United States; and

Whereas the main entrance to the sound is of such a nature that defense by torpedoes is difficult, if not impracticable, and no system of defense can be complete that does not include a sufficient fleet of monitors or other description of armored floating batteries; and

Whereas the seacoast States are unable to provide for their own defense by reason of the prohibition of the United States Constitution as well as their surrender to the Federal Government of the revenues from their ports of entry:

Resolved by this Assembly, That the people of Connecticut, believing that thorough preparation for defensive warfare is essential to the free action of the National Government in dealing with foreign powers, that a consciousness on our part and a knowledge on the part of the world of our rich and defenseless seacoast is calculated both to invite aggression and to hamper the Government in the vigorous protection of the rights and property of our citizens, and that the few million dollars withheld from timely preparation in the days of peace is sure to cause the loss of hundreds of millions and unnecessary suffering and dishonor in time of war, which is certain to come and to come without long warning, respectfully urge upon Congress immediate provision for placing our whole seacoast in a condition for thorough defense, and express their willingness to sustain appropriations for that purpose limited in amount only by the necessities of a complete defensive preparation.

Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use every legitimate effort to promote such measures and appropriations as will most fully and speedily attain the desired result, and especially to use every endeavor to secure adequate protection for our own defenseless coast, both by fortifications and armored floating batteries.

House of representatives, January 27, 1886. Passed.

Senate, January 29, 1886. Passed.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT, Office of Secretary of State.

I, Charles A. Russell, secretary of the said State of Connecticut, and keeper of the seal thereof, and of the original record of the acts and resolutions of the General Assembly of said State, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of the resolution concerning national defense of seacoast with the original records of the same now remaining in this office, and have found the said copy to be a correct transcript thereof and of the whole of said original.

And I further certify that the said original record is a public record of the State of Connecticut now remaining in this office.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Hartford, this 25th day of March, 1886.

[SEAL.] CHARLES A. RUSSELL,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, presented a concurrent resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa; which was referred to the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Concurrent resolution relating to the National Board of Health.

Whereas the several acts of Congress constituting and organizing the National Board of Health, with power to investigate the sources of disease among the people, to prevent the introduction of contagious and infectious disease into the United States from foreign ports, to co-operate and aid State and municipal boards of health in the control and suppression of epidemic diseases; and

Whereas the National Board of Health has discharged the important trusts committed to its care with such fidelity and efficiency as to have won the commendation, favor, and support of sanitary authorities in this country and Europe; and

Whereas there is work to be done by such a board which can not be done by any local or State board, and which is not and can not be adequately represented or fulfilled by any other branch of the national service; and

Whereas it is deemed of the greatest importance that the National Board of Health be maintained in all its integrity and efficiency as the great central health-protecting power of the National Government, ready to co-operate and aid State and municipal boards of health in the prevention of the introduction of contagious and infectious diseases into this country and their spread from one State into another: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That the General Assembly of the State of Iowa earnestly request the members of Congress from the State of Iowa to exert their influence and vote to secure adequate appropriations by Congress to continue the work of the National Board of Health in investigating the causes of disease, of co-operating with State and local boards of health, of carrying on the immigration-inspection service, and protecting the public health.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to send to each of the Iowa delegation in Congress a copy of these resolutions, and one copy to W. P. Dunwoody, secretary of the National Board of Health, Washington, D. C.

Adopted in the senate March 19, 1886.

ERNEST HOFER,
Assistant Secretary of Senate.

Concurred in by the house March 22, 1886.

FRANK S. RICE,
Assistant to Chief Clerk of the House.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the original concurrent resolution as adopted by the Twenty-first General Assembly of Iowa, as the same appears on file in my office.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and cause to be affixed the great seal of the State.

Done at Des Moines, the capital, this 24th day of March, A. D. 1886, of the Independence of the United States the one hundred and tenth, of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.
D. W. SMITH, Deputy.

Mr. BROWN. I present the memorial of Local Assembly No. 2992, of the Knights of Labor of the city of Atlanta, county of Fulton, in the State of Georgia, remonstrating against the passage of what is known as the free-ship bill, two hundred knights being present at the time the memorial was adopted. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COKE. I present the memorial of the Waco Land and Stock-Growing Company, through its president, C. M. Seley; of C. W. White, president of the Colorado Cattle Company; of E. W. Rotan, president of the Pease River Cattle Company; of Thomas P. Abeel, president of the Burnham Land Live-Stock and Tanning Company; of W. W. Seley, president of the Central Texas Live-Stock Association, and of a large number of citizens of Waco, Tex., remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill 1715 in its present shape, being a bill to regulate the transportation of live stock. The particular portion of the bill objected to is comprised in section 1, lines numbered 9, 10, and 11, which read as follows:

> And for the regular feeding and watering of such stock in transit at intervals not exceeding twelve hours each.

This clause it is contended will do great injustice to the live-cattle producers and shippers of Idaho, Wyoming, Dakota, the Indian Territory, Nebraska, Minnesota, Kansas, Iowa, Missouri, Texas, and, in fact, of all the cattle-producing States and Territories in the West, Southwest, and Northwest, where the travel by rail is a run of over twelve hours. The memorialists argue the question at some length and very forcibly. I move that the memorial, together with the accompanying letter from R. G. Head, president of the Range Association of Denver, Colo., be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALTHALL presented a memorial of the Association of Congregational Churches of Mississippi, referring to the failure of the Freedman's Bank, and recommending the establishment of a postal savings system; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SPOONER presented a petition of the village board of Baldwin, Wis., praying for certain amendments of the interstate commerce bills now pending; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of M. E. Johnson and others, of Saint Croix County, Wisconsin, praying the enactment of a law placing all imitations of and substitutes for butter under the control of the Internal Revenue Department, with a tax sufficient to defray the expense of enforcing the law; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented resolutions adopted by Typographical Union No. 211, of Oshkosh, Wis., remonstrating against the passage of the bill for the establishment of an international copyright; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented petitions of the Knights of Labor of Black River Falls, Milwaukee, and Racine, in the State of Wisconsin, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON presented petitions of Knights of Labor of the counties of Philadelphia and Carbon, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Association of ex-Union Prisoners of War of Reading, Pa., praying that ex-Union prisoners of war may be pensioned; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of members of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of a bill restoring to the Army Capt. T. J. Spencer, late of the Tenth United States Cavalry; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE presented petitions of monthly meeting of Friends of Durham and Limington, in the State of Maine, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. DAWES presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Gloucester, Mass., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of a harbor of refuge at Sandy Bay, Rockport, Mass.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Gillespie and Monmouth, Ill., remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TELLER presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Denver and Silverton, in the State of Colorado, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of the common council of Albany, Oreg., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 1111) to set apart from the public domain in the State of Oregon as a public park for the benefit of the people of the United States certain townships in the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. INGALLS presented resolutions adopted by the board of commissioners of Jackson County, Kansas; resolutions adopted by the common council of Holton, Kans., and a petition of several hundred citizens of Jackson County, Kansas, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 270) to provide for the sale of the lands belonging to the Prairie band of Pottawatomie Indians in Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Knights of Labor of Burlingame, Osage County, Kansas, and a petition of Knights of Labor of Cherokee County, Kansas, praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR presented the petition of Albert E. Griffin and other seamen of the United States, praying that section 10 of the shipping act of June 26, 1884, forbidding the payment of advance wages to seamen, be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Henry Y. Reed, president of Associated Charities, and other citizens of Taunton, Mass., praying for the passage of a bill providing for a system of post-office savings-banks; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of the Knights of Labor of Olathe, Kans., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Timbered Hills Society of Friends of Columbus, Kans., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a memorial of Knights of Labor of Stanberry, Gentry County, Missouri, remonstrating against the passage of the free-ship bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Neenah, Wis., praying for the construction by the Government of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL presented a petition of citizens of Lake Worth, Dade County, Florida, praying that the bill introduced in Congress for the establishment of a signal station at, and a line of telegraph to, Jupiter Inlet light-house, Florida, be so amended that Lake Worth shall be the location instead of Jupiter Inlet light-house; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 1566) to establish a new land district in the Territory of Wyoming; and

A bill (H. R. 4493) to amend the act of June 15, 1844, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRAY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 582) for the relief of the board of field officers of the Fourth Brigade of South Carolina Volunteer State Troops, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 2001) to restore to the town of Beaufort, S. C., the books, maps, and pamphlets of the public library of said town taken away by the United States during the war of the rebellion; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. PUGH, it was Ordered, That the papers in respect to the claim of Mrs. Elizabeth Sinclair be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

LIEUT. W. P. RANDALL.

On motion of Mr. DAWES, it was Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy.

WORKS NEAR BATTERY ISLAND LIGHT.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, requested to inform the Senate as to the extent of the injury to the Government works near Battery Island light by the recent ice-flow from the Susquehanna River, and submit an estimate of the probable cost to repair the piers and breakwaters and better protect them against future damage.

EFFICENCY OF THE ARMY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions the morning business is closed, and in pursuance of the order of the Senate, made at the last sitting, Senate bill 777 is before the Senate as the unfinished business of the morning hour.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to strike out section 2 of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Before the question is taken, I desire for a few moments to call the attention of the Senate to the proposition of section 2, which is to increase the efficiency of the Army. I ask that a letter dated March 25, 1886, from the Lieutenant-General commanding the Army be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 25, 1886.

SIR: In reply to your inquiries with reference to my opinion and recommendation as to the suggested increase in the enlisted strength of the Army to thirty thousand men, I have the honor to ask your attention to the paragraph in my last annual report, which, as it is my only military recommendation, emphasizes my opinion of its advisability, where I recommend the increase of the number of men in the companies and the addition of two companies to each regiment of infantry. The latter measure, while one of organization, also possesses a great measure in that, if the companies are enlisted to the strength allowed by law it adds twenty-five hundred men to the infantry arm of the service, the former also as directly advises the increase of the enlisted force, which, if made at the rate of only ten men to each of the four hundred and thirty companies now composing the line of the Army, would add forty-three hundred men, or with the additional companies also contemplated, sixty-eight hundred men in all, bringing the Army to a strength somewhat in excess of that mentioned in your inquiry. My report for 1884 also contains a similar recommendation with reference to the addition of fifty companies of infantry. The last report, that for 1883, of my predecessor, General Sherman, as well as several former reports, advocated a like organization with each regiment of infantry recruited to eight hundred men, an addition to the infantry arm of seventy-five hundred men.

The report of Major-General Scofield for 1885, which accompanied my last annual report, discussed this subject most ably and at considerable length; as you well know he gave it as his opinion "that it was extremely unwise to limit the Army to its present strength."

Citations from the late reports and expressed opinions of many officers of high rank could be further made, all showing a universal belief that the Army is too small for the proper and economical discharge of the varied and oftentimes arduous duties that it is compelled to perform.

With the present enlisted force companies in too many cases can only be maintained at a strength so small that even for the routine duties of garrison life they are not properly adequate; their drill and instruction is made more difficult, and the interest and enthusiasm of the officers and that of their men in their profession is materially lessened, thereby decreasing their military value.

With the Army as now constituted, every Indian outbreak or every threatened trouble compels frequent transportation of troops, involving great expense. How numerous these dangers have been, even lately, is set forth in my last annual report. If we had more men a sufficient force could be assembled at any desired points without bringing troops from the great distance that is now necessitated by the small size of the companies. This concentration could thus be made more rapidly—a very essential feature from a military point of view—and at a greatly diminished expense, thereby entailing a saving nearly sufficient to defray the cost of the maintenance of these additional men. Fortunately, no Indian war of any considerable magnitude has occurred during the last few years. I sincerely hope an equal good fortune will await us in the future. The past, however, shows that the Indian outbreak is generally sudden, often without specific or adequate cause but rather as the consequence of an accumulation of grievances, fancied or real. They have frequently been induced by the vicinity of settlers, and the Indians' fear of a possible restriction upon their almost unlimited freedom which that may bring about. These conditions still exist, and to a greater or less extent will for years to come, and in view of these facts I have deemed it a wise policy to be prepared for emergencies, and have therefore made in the past, and renewed last year, my recommendation for a moderate increase in the enlisted strength of the Army.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General, Commanding.

Hon. JOHN A. LOGAN, United States Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. In connection with that communication I desire to read one or two extracts from a letter from General Schofield, who is now second in command, directed to myself, dated Chicago, February 22, 1886. He says:

I have read with pleasure the bill to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States reported by you February 9, 1886. It seems to me excellent in all its features. Possibly one or two slight modifications might be made to it. In the first section, fifth line, the word "may" might be substituted for "shall."

Which amendment was made to the bill in accordance with his suggestion. Then he goes on generally to speak of the bill and approves it most heartily in all its features. In his last report made to the Secretary of War he makes suggestions in the same line with the propositions of the pending bill.

I wish to refer to some remarks made in opposition to this bill, which I think were made without properly comprehending the scope and effect of the measure in reference to the increased expenses on account of the additional number of troops that the bill proposes in order to add to the efficiency of the Army.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] doubtless based his statement upon the appropriations made heretofore, and the estimate that we have generally made in reference to regiments. For instance, the expense of a regiment is generally estimated, loosely estimated, however, as a million dollars per annum. That includes the transportation, all the expenses of recruiting stations, and all the expenses, incidental and otherwise, pertaining to the Army. It will be remarked that if an additional force of private soldiers is added to the Army, it does not increase the expense so far as what we call transportation pertaining to the Army is concerned. Of course, in transporting troops on railroads the number would be estimated, and to that extent the expense would be increased, but transportation in army phrase, as we understand it, army wagons, mules, teams, harness, provision for horses, and all such things, would not be increased, because the Army to-day is supplied sufficiently with that character of transportation for an increase of many more troops than are estimated in the bill. So, in making the estimate, persons who have not perhaps examined this question as closely as those who are connected with the Army now, and make their reports in reference thereto, would naturally make this mistake. It is a mistake that would occur coming from almost any one.

But, in the estimate which I had made by the Paymaster-General in reference to this proposed increase and in reference to the posts where persons are being now enlisted into the Army, his statement, made upon a basis of all the expenses connected with the Army, is:

The difference of pay to enlisted men (see statement herewith) under section 2 would be $870,244.

That is, the additional pay that this bill would carry with it pertaining to the Army as it is now, the increase and all the pay and expense connected with the present Army, would amount to $870,240. The increase of pay connected with the five thousand additional soldiers that the bill proposes to recruit for the Army would be $900,000; additional pay to eighty-seven assistant quartermasters $8,700; instructors for post-schools, $34 per month, $61,200, making the whole expense connected with this bill in increasing the pay of the Army, in adding school-teachers to the Army, or instructors as they are called, and the five thousand men, it would altogether amount to $1,900,184; but the five thousand additional troops taken from the bill, if the amendment of the Senator from Maine should pass, would reduce the expense $960,000. In other words, the adding of five thousand men to the Army increases the expense only $900,000.

As I said, the statement made by the Senator from Maine and the Senator from Colorado was justified from former expenses, where they include all the expenses and divide up the total and make the calculation that the expense additional on account of the five thousand which the bill proposes would be proportionate to the balance of the Army as it now exists, would be a correct calculation but for the error made, as I said, by dividing up the cost of transportation and everything of the kind that is connected with the Army at the present time.

I find that the Army now consists, as I said on a former occasion, of ten regiments of cavalry, five regiments of artillery, twenty-five regiments of infantry, and an engineer battalion. In the law it is aggregated at twenty-five thousand enlisted men, sergeants, &c., making in all something over twenty-six thousand men, including the officers.

My attention has just been called, and I will very gladly make the correction, to the fact that I have not made the addition for rations, which being computed would be probably $600,000. Perhaps that would make a million and a half dollars of expense for the additional five thousand troops, but suppose it reached two million or five million dollars, I do not think that is the great question in the organization of an army. Where your Army costs as it does to-day according to the estimates and appropriations, I do not think that is the great question in the case; and I was going on to try to show that for the efficiency of the Army it ought not to be a calculation as to a small amount of expenditure, but a question for the people of this country as to whether they have an army that is efficient or whether its efficiency shall be increased materially by the addition of a small expense.

To-day the Army amounts to about twenty-five thousand seven hundred, say in round numbers twenty-six thousand men, officers and all. The total of enlisted men to-day in the Army amounts to twenty-three thousand six hundred and ninety-six. When we find the law authorizing twenty-five thousand enlisted men in the Army we naturally suppose that there are twenty-five thousand men in the Army, but that is not the case, and it never will be the case. Under a law giving twenty-five thousand men to an army it is a rare case that you find twenty-three thousand men in the army.

It requires constant recruiting to keep an army up anywhere near the maximum, and no army that I have ever known was ever up to the maximum of efficient men. I suppose there is not a Senator here who served in the late war, either on the Union or on the confederate side, but knows the fact to be that no corps in either army at any time could ever get the number of men that they had enlisted in a fight, on a march, or could ever find them in their camps or out of camp. That is always the case in all armies. As I said, recruiting will not keep an army up to the maximum. Sickness, death, disease, everything of that kind rapidly disintegrates an army, more so than almost any other body of men.

So the increase to-day of five thousand additional enlisted men, making the maximum thirty thousand, would give us of efficient men in the Army, with constant recruiting, about twenty-seven thousand men and not more. I will venture the assertion that if the bill were to pass to-day with the second section in, at no time in the future, with the legal maximum at thirty thousand men, would you ever find when the appropriations were made more than twenty-seven thousand men reported by the general commanding the Army or the Secretary of War for appropriations by the Congress of the United States.

So I can not see why any one should object to the second section remaining in the bill. We talk about an army of twenty-five thousand men, and it is supposed by the country that we have that number of men, when in fact we never have that number and never have had under the law; and I can not see why it is that an opposition to the increase of the efficiency of the Army by raising it at least to what is the maximum now and a little more should be objected to. I can not understand it.

My friend the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] sounded the bugle-note and gave warning to his Democratic friends here that it would not do to vote for this bill, because this was a Democratic administration, and therefore we must keep expenditures down. That is one side of the question, the political side, but not a statesman's view of it. On the other side, not stated in open Senate, I fear we have some friends who are afraid to vote for this, because the President would have the appointing of a few extra officers when vacancies may occur if we organize the Army as is proposed and suggested by the Lieutenant-General into three battalions to a regiment. The result of that would be an increase of a few subordinate officers, and therefore the President would have the appointment of those officers from civil life, and it is feared he would appoint Democrats, perhaps. I must say that that is not a statesmanlike view of it either. I take no such view of this question, nor do I give it any such thought. If this bill should pass with the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], of course the President would have the right to appoint a few lieutenants; not very many. What kind of persons he would appoint I do not know, nor should I inquire, so that he appointed good men. But I will say that men who are appointed in the Army to-day from civil life as lieutenants have to pass an examination before a board of officers before their names can be sent to the Senate. At least that is the rule, and it is always complied with; so that if a dozen men, Democrats or Republicans, should go before that board and apply for these appointments, the men best qualified would be the men who ought to pass, and they, I presume, would be those whom the President would appoint, without asking their politics. I certainly would do so, and I do not see why he should not, and I believe he would, because I think he is inclined to do right, as far as he understands it. But that cuts no figure with me. If I knew to-day that he would appoint every man of them from Democrats, if they were competent, that would not prevent me from trying to improve the Army, nor should it prevent any man; and I am sorry to find so frequently among men who ought to rise to a higher plane, on every little question that comes up here, suggestions about politics. What have politics to do with it? Instead of that we should inquire as to the thing proposed, whether it is a thing that will advance the interests of the country, that will increase the efficiency of the service, no matter whether it is civil or military; and it should not be decided according to some political grievance or some political idea.

Now, sir, I will say to those friends, if there are any such, who are alarmed about the character of men who might be appointed to some of these offices, that they have had the same opportunity for the last ten years to do this thing when Republicans had power in this country and when we had Republican administrations, yet they failed then to do it, failed to come to the assistance of the same sort of bill that I have introduced time and again in Congress. So I do not think an excuse of that kind would be very good at the present time if any such excuse should find a lodgment in the mind of any gentleman here.

Mr. President, as is said in the letter of General Sheridan, this bill is calculated to decrease instead of increasing the expense of the Army. Why? It will give an opportunity to place larger bodies of men at posts convenient to railroad transportation or water transportation, and the more men we can bring together and have there for purposes of drill, for purposes of discipline, for purposes of being handled and made into an efficient army, the cheaper it will be and the less proportionate expense you will have. It is the transportation to and from the different posts, where you have one company or two companies, that causes some of the great expenses of the Army. If you had larger posts with a larger number of men at each of them, then if an outbreak should occur anywhere among the Indians or if the President or Lieutenant-General desired to send the Army to particular points it would be easy to transport large bodies on railroads. It could be done more cheaply; it would be less expensive than if we have our troops distributed in all parts of the country in little posts from which the railroads have to carry them back and forth all the time when a necessity arises. That is about all I have to say in reference to this proposition, except merely to call the attention of the Senate to what is commonly understood to be the expenses of the Army as reported by the Secretary of War. A great portion of the expenses that are understood by the country as being expenses of the Army is money appropriated entirely for a different purpose, that is placed in the hands of the Secretary of War or of some portion of the Army for expenditure, and should not be counted as part of the expenses of the Army.

For instance, for the Army and military establishment the total expense is $25,640,495, averaging about a million dollars per regiment; then for public works, including river and harbor improvements, the expenditure was $16,455,630.18; miscellaneous objects, paying claims and things of that kind presented to the Secretary of War, $4,292,079; and adding salaries and contingent expenses the aggregate is $48,204,183.48. Of that $48,204,183.48 expended by the War Department and generally understood as being the expenses of the Army, one-half has nothing to do with the Army establishment, the cost of which is, as reported, $25,640,495.51 all told. Much of the money which is expended by the Government of the United States through the War Department is charged as part of the expenses of the Army, when, in fact, its disbursement could be put just as well in the hands of civilians, if the Congress of the United States desired to do it, and is no part of the duty of the Army really except as made so by Congress.

Mr. President, I am very anxious that this provision should be adopted. I know it has been said that the general officers of the Army like to have a great army to show off and exhibit. That is not correct. Twenty-five or thirty thousand men is not a great army. As humble an individual as I am, I have commanded three times that many men at one time and did not think it was a very large army then as compared with other armies. It is no army at all for a great Government like this. Because I desire to see this establishment placed upon a fair footing so that at least it will have some efficiency and some appearance of an army, that is no ground for saying that I want a great standing army. I do not; but I want such a one as the people of this country will not be ashamed of; I want such a one as will be efficient according to its numbers and according to its organization. Now the organization of our Army is sufficient for a much larger number of men than we have. All I desire is to see that it is made as efficient as possible according to the ideas that people have of the times and according to the framework of that Army as organized by the laws of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it seems to me that any bill which is to add any considerable burden to the Treasury ought to be placed upon very solid ground before it is adopted. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN], I think, showed that he had not very thoroughly considered this question of expense when he proposed this morning to the Senate seriously that the pay of the men to be enlisted under this bill would amount to only a million dollars or less, overlooking, what he only momentarily did, however, the fact that the men who are paid have also to be fed and clothed and transported, doctored and sheltered. An army of twenty-five thousand men costs the Government about $26,000,000 a year, and the estimate that a thousand dollars a head is the cost of the enlisted men of the Army (which has been accepted by the War Department and by all those who have had to do with it) is the proper average. Of course, adding five thousand men without adding officers might possibly add a little less than that average to the expense; but those of us who know how steadily and yet how certainly the Army expenses increase in various ways, and how every excuse is sought for to add to the expenditures will not be slow, I think, to accept the conclusion that the addition of five thousand men means the addition of $5,000,000 to the amount of money now annually appropriated for the maintenance of the Army.

That is not all there is in this bill, to some portions of which I will come later. I think the other expenses which the bill provides for will add at least $2,000,000 more, besides ingrafting some rather doubtful principles upon the Army as well.

The justification which this measure has found so far has been threefold. First, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] says we want it on account of the Indians, who he thinks are about to descend on the defenseless frontier; and, secondly, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] thinks we want it on account of the local disturbances likely to occur growing out of the labor question and because of the Monroe doctrine; and, third, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] wants it because he thinks we ought to have a respectable Army, and one that can make a good show in the presence of this country and of Europe.

If I believed the frontier was defenseless or was lacking for troops, I think I should be as ready as any one to vote the necessary increase of expense in order that the number of soldiers might be increased. Allusion was made to the fact that my colleague had introduced a bill for the establishment of two additional posts on the south line of Kansas as an evidence that a danger presented itself there which could only be met by increasing the number of soldiers. It will be noted, however, that that bill does not call for any additional soldiers and it was not the belief of my colleague, certainly it is not mine, that the establishment of those additional posts down there would require additional troops. Whoever has curiosity enough to look over the list of posts which are garrisoned by the United States Army now, as published in the RECORD a few days ago, will find that singularly enough the greatest number of troops are not where according to the prognostics of the Senator from Nebraska the danger happens to be. We find men sheltered safely at Washington, at Fortress Monroe, at various points on the Canadian border, at points more than a thousand miles away from any possible hostile Indian; and thus those who manage the Army, whatever they say on paper, do not seem to share the apprehensions of danger which the Senator from Nebraska has expressed.

I think it is safe to say that whatever danger we may have had heretofore is diminishing day by day. There is no possibility of an Indian campaign anywhere except it may be in Arizona and New Mexico, and the danger in that quarter is very much less than it has been heretofore. It is not possible for the Indian to engage in a campaign permanently in which he is far away from his family or unless he is able to take his family to some place of refuge while he is carrying on that campaign. There is no game any more in the Rocky Mountains; there is no more wild game anywhere which the Indian can resort to for means of support. Nearly every Indian in the United States is substantially supported by the United States Government by the appropriations which purchase beef, and bread, and sugar, and coffee, and clothing, and so on. These are appeals to the stomach of the Indian as they are to everybody else. While I have no doubt there are many Indians, possibly a majority of them, who around their camp-fires and in their war-dances revive in their recollections the memories of scalping expeditions in which they or their ancestors engaged, and possibly which they repeat in anticipation of what they would like to do, I have noticed that these exhibitions of temper are all there is to them. They subside and are forgotten.

It is true, a few Indians might break out from the Sioux reservation in Dakota. A handful, of course, could make a great disturbance among the settlers of that frontier and would undoubtedly produce great havoc, leading to an enormous desertion of homes. A similar outbreak in the Indian Territory in the direction of Kansas or of Texas would produce the same result, a result to be not only deplored but to be prevented. But with not one-half the Indians from whom anything of that kind could be expected now that there were five years ago, where is the warrant now for increasing the Army just as the danger from that source is disappearing?

It was stated in the papers some months ago that the Senator from Nebraska designed to introduce a bill to provide for the creation of two or three regiments of volunteers, whose duty it should be to fight Indians, a confession that the regular Army was not qualified for that kind of duty even with the number of twenty-five thousand men, as compared with the two thousand five hundred men proposed to be enlisted; and a bill of that kind has been introduced elsewhere and I presume will be pressed for passage.

Seriously, if we are to provide a force which is to cope successfully with the Indians upon the basis of dangers such as we have heretofore had, or upon the basis of dangers such as the Senator from Nebraska, for the purpose of supporting this bill, now leads us to anticipate, that increase ought to come from the men on the frontier. General Crook has been contending now nearly a year with a handful of Indians in the mountains of New Mexico, Arizona, and old Mexico, and he has said to the War Department repeatedly that he did not want another soldier. General Sheridan has been profuse with offers of troops to General Crook in order that the massacre of settlers which was going on in that section of country might be stopped. General Crook has replied, and justly, "I have troops enough."

Last summer there was a press of danger upon the southern border of Kansas, and no one could be more sensitive about that than I am myself. I know the alarm which was created in that section of country. In a large measure it was causeless, but at the same time the alarm existed. It was the duty of the President, in command of the Army, to prevent that alarm and the consequences which followed it. After the alarm had assumed some considerable proportions it was found convenient, without denuding the coast, to send 1,600 men to that border. Half that number of men, with two extra posts along that border, would give that perfect security which is required.

But the point I make is that out of the twenty-five thousand men we have, if we could only spare them from the posts, which they seem to prefer to the excitements and dangers of the frontier service, we should have plenty to surround the Sioux reservation near Nebraska and the reservations in the Indian Territory with a cordon of troops who would furnish as perfect protection as troops could give. It is not the lack of troops, it is the lack of a proper disposition of them which we are confronted with to-day, provided always the anticipations of the Senator from Nebraska with reference to the condition of things in the Indian country are correct. The garrisons at Fort Robinson and on the other flank of the Sioux reservation can be doubled and quadrupled without adding a single soldier to those now enlisted. So in regard to troops for the southern border of Kansas or the northern border of Texas, they can be had in ample numbers from the force already maintained by the Government.

As I said before, an Indian campaign hereafter is impossible except it may be among the Apaches in Arizona and New Mexico; and there what does a campaign mean? It means the outbreak of fifteen or twenty or perhaps fifty Indians at the outside, and their unavailing pursuit by hundreds and even thousands of soldiers, a few more of which would not be any more effective than those thousands. That I state on the authority of General Crook, who undoubtedly, alive as he was to the danger there and the risk his own reputation was subjected to by reason of the massacres going on unchecked, said to the Secretary, "It is not troops I want; I have troops enough."

Against spasmodic outbreaks of different kinds it may not be possible to protect the settlers who are living adjacent to these reservations; and yet I do not believe we shall have even such as those. The Indians know that, sooner or later, punishment comes; they know they have no recesses in the Rocky Mountains or elsewhere to which they can retire with any impunity. They know they are girdled round about, that they are dependent wholly for a livelihood, for food and shelter and clothing, upon the Government of the United States, and they are not going to throw those things away; they are not going to break out in order to render more precarious that living to which they are so much attached.

It was a little singular to me that in this time of peace, in this time of almost complete subsidence of actual or contemplated Indian warfare, a measure of this kind should be pushed forward for the first time in many years.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me to express the hope that I shall at least have justice done to what I have stated. He says this is the first time that a measure of this kind has been brought forward for many years. The Military Committee know that I have pressed this measure upon Congress for years and years before that committee, and there is not one of them who will not stand on this floor and state that fact.

Mr. PLUMB. I am not talking about private conversations in regard to this matter; I am talking about public exhibitions on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I introduced this bill in the last Congress and you will find it presented in different Congresses and referred to the Military Committee at nearly every session since the Army was reduced and I have been in the Senate. Not only that, but I have urged it before the Appropriations Committee. I have not urged it before Congress for the reason that no bill has been reported. I never have had before permission to report a bill of this kind. That is the reason for it. I hope the Senator will not make a statement of that kind to make an impression upon the country that there is some pressing necessity just at this moment, because I deny any such thing. There is no more pressing necessity about it than there has been. I introduced it for the efficiency of the Army and to improve the Army and for no other purpose.

Mr. PLUMB. I will make the statement in a different shape. It is a little singular then that now for the first time in many years the proposition is made to make the Army more efficient. When I speak of a proposition I do not refer to the mere formal introduction of a bill, but to the introduction of a bill and the indorsement of that bill by a committee of this body. That is an impetus this has got now which it has not had before since I have been here. I do not think the proposition has been seriously made before. I do not mean to impute anything but seriousness to the efforts the Senator from Illinois has made, but it is a seriousness which has been confined to himself. It has now back of it the determination of the Military Committee, and I speak of that as rather singular. I repeat, it is a little sigular that at this particular time, when it would seem so far as the use of an army was concerned we were in a more peaceful condition than ever before for a generation, there should come forward seriously a proposition not only to increase the number of the Army, but to materially increase the expenses of the Army and to increase the privileges and pay of its officers.

I may say, however, in passing, that having myself paid very little attention to such things, I have never found any bill introduced here which had any show of passing that reduced the privileges of the Army or reduced the pay; but hundreds of them have passed which increased that pay while everybody else's pay was diminishing. It is perhaps a natural outgrowth of that feeling which has manifested itself in single bills, and finally comes on in the shape of a battalion, and I suppose probably will lead to something greater after a while.

The necessity is not on account of the Indian. The Senator from Connecticut—and I was very sorry to hear him say it—said there were signs of local disturbances which we should need an army to put down. I was sorry to hear him say that, because of the very great respect that I have for him, and because I dislike to hear sentiments of that kind uttered anywhere. Whenever we come to that point that the Army of the United States has to be depended upon as a chief or main reliance for the putting down of local disturbances, a much more serious condition of things will have arrived than I ever expect to live to see. This is either a Government of popular opinion and republican in fact, or it is a despotism. If public opinion can not rule this country, then it can not be ruled as a Republic, and when I say "public opinion," I do not mean to say there shall be no police, no constabulary, no sheriffs, no marshals, and so on; but whenever the Army of the United States has to be brought in as a frequent resource for the purpose of quelling local disturbance, then I say it will be because public opinion has ceased to do its perfect work, and the individual citizens upon whom this Government should rest and upon whom it will rest if it is to be a republic have ceased to do their duty, and are calling on the Federal power to do that which they themselves ought to do.

I know there will be on occasions obstructions to the execution of the laws; and I do not refer now to anything that has recently occurred or which is occurring. I have no doubt in the Senator's own city and in other cities there will be mobs at times beyond the power of the local police to control for the moment. But whenever that time comes, if along with it shall come the disposition and the feeling on the part of citizens, "I have got no part or lot in all this business; it is not to devolve responsibility on me for what has led to these things, nor am I to put my own neck in the collar and help to put these things down, but I appeal to the national power," then public opinion has lost its office and its function in this country, and this country will be governed in all its parts and for all purposes from the central power at Washington.

I should be sorry to have a lesson of that kind learned. I have heard at different times expressions of desire that Government troops might be present at a particular point for the purpose of putting down local disturbances, no matter what the right or wrong might be, disturbances which for the time being ought perhaps to have been put down. But admitting this, still the lesson of force as the ultimate remedy for disturbances of that kind is a lesson which this country ought not to and can not afford to learn. It can not afford to permit the people who are to be put down by this force to learn it either. Justice is the one thing that is needed and force the last thing to be used, and of all force the last of all to be used is that of the General Government.

There are troops enough for all ordinary police purposes such as the Government of the United States can be called on to exercise. Any increase of that number simply puts burdens upon labor and arms the central authority with the temptation to use it and invites those who may seek to throw the responsibility which they ought themselves to assume upon the General Government.

The Senator from Connecticut said there was the Monroe doctrine to be enforced. He evidently has not read the message of the President delivered to Congress at the opening of this session, in which, if I understand the English language, that doctrine is wholly abandoned. It may remain for some future administration to assert it, but the present one will not do it evidently.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right here? Does he think the people have abandoned that doctrine?

Mr. PLUMB. The only way I know of whereby the people can express their will about a matter of that kind is at the ballot-box. What they have done I know. What they may do I do not know. All I do know is that so far as the Monroe doctrine is concerned, for the present it is abandoned. It has been deliberately proposed that the canal that shall be dug to connect the waters of the Atlantic with the Pacific, if any one is ever dug, shall not be the property of the American Government, shall not be what it has been so aptly described heretofore to be, a part of the shore-line of the American Republic, but shall be a water way open alike to all people everywhere in the world, severing us permanently from the South American continent, from all control over it, from all special interest in it. So we shall not need any troops to enforce the Monroe doctrine.

And, Mr. President, when we get into that domain, a domain of international complications, what would five thousand soldiers be, I will ask the Senator from Connecticut? They would not be anything. Would it postpone for one single instant the issuing of a proclamation for volunteers? And if ever the time shall come when the American Government shall lack for maintenance by its inability to get five thousand more men by volunteering, it will be crushed like an egg-shell; there will not be anything left of it if it ever comes so near to destruction that nothing but five thousand men stands between it and its fate.

The great mistake, in my judgment, that was made—speaking humbly in this presence—at the outbreak of the last war was that the regular Army was not disbanded. It was the effort to keep up two absolutely irreconcilable forces, to appply to the volunteer army the rules and regulations and methods of procedure that were applied to the regular Army, that made more trouble, more disorganization, more lack of efficiency during the first two years of our struggle than almost all other causes put together. If at that time the regular Army had been disbanded, if its officers had been taken as chiefs of staffs, as quartermasters, as commissaries, as organizers of the volunteer regiments, we should have had a force promptly that would have answered the purpose that it came finally to answer, but which it took two or three years to bring about. So I think when the next war comes about, if we shall ever have one, the regular Army will be dispersed among the volunteer battalion for the purposes of instruction, to mobilize it, to feed it, to teach it to fight, in place of being kept separate and apart as a fighting machine itself.

I know that you can get all sorts of official opinions about the necessity of an increase of the Army. If the Army were thirty thousand men, every general in the Army would say it ought to be fifty thousand. If it were fifty thousand, every one of them would say it ought to be one hundred thousand. It is one of the peculiarities of an army officer in time of peace that he finally comes to think that the Government is made for him. Like Paul he magnifies his office—a good example, no doubt, but one poorly applied in this case—and so he thinks he ought to have not only more colaborers, more of his kind, but more privileges, more salary, more of everything that goes to make his life comfortable. We have the most extravagant army in the world. The best authority we have on the subject says that the laboring people of the United States get an average of less than $500 per annum each. Our Army costs us a thousand dollars to every enlisted man in it—more than twice as much as the laboring people of the United States get. Is the Government ready to enlist men at this price for the purpose of putting additional burdens upon the men who get this scanty pay of less than $500 a year to elevate and dignify and pay the non-producer at the expense of the producer?

But the Senator from Illinois says he wants an army that is respectable. I think that which we have got along with for the last fifteen years we can get along with for a while longer; that especially at this time when the wages of labor are declining, when the price of food and of clothing, and of everything else, is less than it ever was before, we can get along with the thousand-dollars-a-year soldiers that we have got, rather than to increase the burden upon our ill-paid and struggling laborers. The Senator from Illinois said:

I want the Senator to understand that this proposition to increase the Army is not for any present needs; it is not because there is an Indian war; it is not because there is danger from Indians or danger from anywhere; it is not because I apprehend any danger from any source that I proposed this in the bill before the Military Committee and that the Military Committee agreed to it, but it is that the Government of the United States may at least have an army that will have some respectability when it is called the Army of the United States, both at home and abroad.

Done for show! Six or seven million dollars added by the bill to our expenses just simply in order that there may be more frills and furbelows, more pompons and cockades and shoulder-straps and stripes and so on, more of the glitter and tinsel of military life at a cost of six or seven million dollars a year! Elsewhere in that speech the Senator from Illinois spoke, by way of enforcing that necessity, of the fact that European governments had armies of five or seven hundred thousand men.

We find standing armies in some of the European nations of five hundred thousand or even seven hundred thousand men.

He said it would require the number proposed in this bill—

To make the framework of our Army an army at all. It is not an army to-day, except in name. You find a captain and two lieutenants commanding twenty men. The truth is that in the condition our Army is in to-day the officers are almost ashamed to bring their companies out and exhibit them in the presence of the American people.

That is the reason, I suppose, why so many of the Army officers are at Washington. They are ashamed of their commands. Mr. President, I can say from a somewhat careful knowledge of the situation, that the commands are ashamed of the officers who run away from them. That feeling is at least mutual. And then he goes on to speak about the humiliation of these men bringing out these companies and so on. I undertake to say they generally do not bring them out. Fully one-half of the line officers of the Army do not serve with their companies.

I am fond of show myself. The greatest show this country ever made was not when it had the greatest number of men in the field. I think the greatest epoch in the history of this country was when at the close of the war of the rebellion the armies of Grant and Sherman, and of Sheridan, and of Meade, and of Thomas, and of Hancock assembled in the shadow of this Capitol for the purpose of being mustered out and were mustered out. There was no prouder day for the Republic than when those men made that great historic march down Pennsylvania avenue and went to their camps outside this city to be mustered out. The greatness of this country is not and never can be measured by the size of its Army. I will ask the Secretary to read the first paragraph of an article on the United States Army by Archibald Forbes, published in the North American Review about a year and a half ago, which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read as follows:

Returning from America to Europe last year, I happened to have for a fellow-passenger a German officer. "Ja wohl!" remarked this military servant of Kaiser Wilhelm, "it is truly a great country, this American Republic. I have seen its Congress, I have mounted high in an elevator, I have drunk beautiful lager beer, I have seen swine slaughtered by machinery, I have slept in the car of Pullman, I have voyaged in a river steamer grand as a palace, I have seen a torchlight procession three miles long; but, dear sir, in all this great country I have seen no army. Where is the garrison of New York? Where the garrison of Washington? Where the guard corps of this mighty nation that sixteen years ago had some two millions of men under arms? Yes, I have seen not a few generals, and the country undoubtedly possesses numerous colonels, but where are its legions, where its masses of infantrymen, where its cuirassiers, its uhlans, its hussars? Why, there was not so much as a solitary sentry on the schloss of the President."

Mr. PLUMB. That fact constitutes to-day the greatness of the American Republic in the eyes of the world, the fact that the President of the United States goes to and fro between the White House and the Departments and elsewhere unattended by a guard; that the men who come here, representatives of the armies of Europe, find no soldiers anywhere; they see nearly sixty million people busy about all their vocations, every man attending to his own business as peacefully and quietly as though a million bayonets were ordering it all. No respectable army of thirty thousand men, such as the Senator from Illinois aspires to have, will ever add to that respectability in the minds of foreign people. As I said before, this is a Government not of force, but of public opinion. For eighty days a President of the United States lay wounded to death. There was no President during that period of time, no Chief Magistrate. There was no panic, no disturbance, no fear—nothing out of the usual course.

Was there any lack of perfect security for the performance everywhere of every single function of government, except perhaps that which the disabled President himself could have performed? No shock came to the system of government whereby sixty million people have their affairs ordered, no force was needed at any point where man came in contact with man and where all the business of this country came into association, because every man felt that he with all other men around him was equal to the emergency, which was feeble compared with the emergencies through which this country had gone in which Presidents and Vice-Presidents and even Congresses were matters of small concern. It was public opinion—it was that calm, sedate judgment, informed by experience, by education, by self-respect, by independence, by self-reliance—that animated the American people, as it always had, and which makes them equal to emergencies in which armies are nothing. So of Congress and of all civil authority. We shall not add one single feather's weight to the strength of this structure of ours by putting ten times five thousand men in the Army.

Mr. Forbes in this article—and I take it no one will dispute that he is authority on such matters—says:

The superficial observer might carry away the impression that the American Army bears a striking resemblance to the tadpole, in that it has a very big head and very little body, were he not in the course of his casual reading to come across the fact that its annual cost to the country amounts to some $40,000,000. He reflects that on an annual expenditure of only twelve and a half millions more Germany maintains a standing army of four hundred and twenty thousand men, with the machinery for increasing that strength to a million within a week, and the conclusion is forced upon him that there must be an American army somewhere, if only he can find it.

Because it costs so much of course. For $53,000,000, according to this authority, the German Empire keeps up an army of four hundred and twenty thousand men; in other words, while our soldiers, rank and file, cost us a thousand dollars a head per annum, the German army costs that government $125 per head per annum. We have the best paid, the best fed, the best clothed, the best lodged army in the world. I am not complaining on that account.

We hear a great deal about the aristocracy of the British army. Mr. Forbes goes on to show that the American officer gets a pay which is from two to four times as much as that of the British officer. The British private soldier gets when on active duty a shilling a day, with an allowance for clothing and food very much less than that of the American soldier; and when he is put into the reserves, as he is in due time, he gets sixpence and the same allowance for food and clothing. I do not say we ought to cut our coat according to that cloth, but I do say to-day that the great distinction between our Army and that army is its cost, and we are levying this on men whose pay is less than one-half that of these men whom we keep by this process in the non-productive ranks. We have added 25 per cent. to the pay of the officers of the United States Army since the war. In other words, during the period of time in which everything they eat and wear and use has been reduced more than 50 per cent. below what it was during the war, and during which period of time their duties have become merely nominal, we have constantly increased their pay.

Mr. President, this ought to stop somewhere. I think it ought to have stopped a long time ago. I believe to-day that to be just and fair we should reduce the pay of many of these men, especially those on the retired-list.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. PLUMB. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. He is discussing a good many things, but I should like to call his attention to one proposition. He says the common laborer gets about $500 a year, and he leaves the impression that the soldier gets a thousand dollars a year. The soldier does not get half the pay of a laboring man.

Mr. PLUMB. Out of the pay of a laboring man, which is stated to be about $460 a year, I believe, he has to pay for his food, he has to pay for his clothing, he has to pay for his medical attendance, he has to pay for his shelter, he has to pay for his transportation if he has it, and we pay, feed, and clothe and give medical attendance and shelter to these men at a cost to the United States of $1,000 a head per annum.

Mr. LOGAN. That includes transportation and everything.

Mr. PLUMB. The laboring man has to pay his own transportation.

Mr. LOGAN. Transportation is one of the great items of the cost of the Army.

Mr. PLUMB. I beg the Senator's pardon. Transportation is not much over 10 per cent. of the total. What I say is, that of all times, if there ever was a time when it was desirable the Army should be increased, this is the least excusable time. In the first place, for all the uses to which an army has heretofore been put the occasion for use is now diminishing.

So far as a foreign war is concerned, which has been suggested here, for the maintenance of the Monroe doctrine or for any other purpose, an army of twenty-five thousand or thirty thousand men amounts to nothing. We have got finally to rely upon the volunteer force of this country, and if we can not get volunteers there is no professional army that we can raise which will ever contribute materially to the defense of the country. There is, so far as I believe, no necessity on account of internal disorder for anything more than the usual proportion, and if there were, I maintain that such disorders should be put down by local authority and not by the central authority.

I maintain it not only because I believe it can be just as efficiently done and more wisely done, but because it puts the responsibility exactly where it belongs, in the locality where the disturbance arises. As I said before, nothing could be more fatal in my judgment to the citizen himself than to beget in him the idea that he is not responsible to the extent if necessary of shouldering the musket for local defense, but that he can set himself back within his walls in his country-house or wherever he happens to be and say, "I am not concerned about these things; the United States stands ready to put down this rabble and clear these streets." When he comes to that, he ceases to perform the first duty of a citizen, and becomes himself, consciously or unconsciously but surely, a supporter of a plan which can end only in a monarchy.

There are some other matters in this bill which when the time comes I will bring to the attention of the Senate. I think I will mention one of them now, inasmuch as it to some extent has already passed under the scrutiny of the Senate. It increases in section 3 the pay of nearly every non-commissioned officer in the Army. The increase is from $2 to $8 or $10 a month. The hospital steward is increased $10 a month, and the first sergeant of cavalry, infantry, and artillery is increased $2 a month, and so on it runs $3, $5, and $8 all through the list, while the private soldiers of the engineers and the ordnance are increased, the first class $1 per month, and private soldiers of the second class of engineers and ordnance are increased $3 a month. If there is aristocracy in the Army, an aristocracy within an aristocracy, it is the aristocracy of the engineers and ordnance.

Bear in mind now that the great mass of the private soldiers who are to fight the Indians if they are to be fought, who are to do the military service proper if it is to be done by this Army are not touched at all; but the increase is for privates of the engineers and ordnance who do no fighting—not artillery, mind you, but of the staff corps, the men who never see an enemy and never will see one, but are doing quasi-civil duty, for that is the only duty they have had. They have been singled out here to have their pay increased, while the men who are engaged in hazardous service, a service of fatigue testing their endurance on the frontier, get no increase whatever. That is the discrimination in favor of the aristocracy in the Army, and against the men who are to hold up the banner if it is to be held up at all and do the fighting. I do not know how much that adds.

We speak of hundreds of thousands of dollars with a nonchalance which comes from the fact that we do not pay it and do not consider ourselves as taking any very considerable interest in it, though we are trustees of the people. Perhaps this increase of pay does not add more that five or six hundred thousand dollars to the cost of the Army. Why do so at all? Can any one tell me why in a time of profound peace, when as the Senator from Illinois said in his opening remarks there is no anticipation of war of any kind, we should increase the pay of anybody in the Army?

In 1873 I think it was, after a somewhat conspicuous demonstration of the great abuses and corruptions and scandals that had grown out of what was known as commutation for wood, Congress finally abolished the allowance of wood to the Army officers and provided that thereafter they should pay for wood at the price——

Mr. LOGAN. I presume the Senator does not wish to leave a wrong impression on the Senate and the country when he says the increase only applies to sergeants of ordnance. I presume he does not wish that to be understood.

Mr. PLUMB. I said to the privates of engineers and ordnance.

Mr. LOGAN. The bill says "privates of cavalry, artillery, and infantry"—if there are any other arms of the service I do not know what they are—"are to receive $16 a month." That is the language of the bill.

Mr. PLUMB. Where is that found?

Mr. LOGAN. At the top of the third page. "Privates of cavalry, artillery, and infantry, $16."

Mr. PLUMB. I had overlooked that. I see they are increased from $13 to $16.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir, a larger amount than the increase of any other class.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well. They ought to be increased if the others are increased.

Mr. LOGAN. They are.

Mr. PLUMB. But when we have been getting along so many years without this increase in pay, why should we increase it at this time? Is that a part of the plan to make the Army more respectable, more of a show, and all that sort of thing, which the Senator thinks justifies the addition of $7,000,000 to the annual appropriations?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir. I will state to the Senator why. Any man who is a soldier of the United States in my judgment is entitled to $16 per month. That is the reason.

Mr. PLUMB. I think that any man who is laboring around a public fort or on a public or a private work or anywhere else, where he is required to labor in order that he may live, is entitled to about as much as a soldier; and I am not in favor of levying money upon these laboring men in order that these non-producers may have higher wages, and. at a time, too, when there is absolutely no excuse for it. If we were threatened with a war, and it became necessary in order to enlist these men that we should pay higher wages, then we ought to pay them; otherwise not.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me right there. I will not accuse anybody of demagogism, but I certainly do not wish to practice it myself,

Mr. PLUMB. I know the Senator does not, but he does it all the same. He can go on.

Mr. LOGAN. You can say I do if you wish. The distinction is this, and the Senator ought to see it: What has Congress to do with increasing the wages of laborers all over the country? If I had it in my power I would be willing to do it, but we have no such power. We have power to increase the poor soldiers' pay, and as far as we have power to go I am willing to go. When the Senator undertakes to make a point that we increase the soldiers' pay and the poor laborers get nothing, when we have no power to touch them, as he knows, I say it is a species of argument I would not be guilty of.

Mr. PLUMB. I am much obliged, because that convinces me more thoroughly of the soundness of my argument. I say that we do touch upon the laborer, because we levy upon the people who do the labor the money necessary to pay these additional wages. It is the men who wear the clothing and eat the food who pay the taxes that keep up this Government. It is a demand more nearly per capita than some people have been in the habit of stating or believing. While it is true, as the Senator from Illinois says, that we can not raise the wages of laborers generally, we can at least refrain from adding to their burden by laying additional taxes on them. We can do that much at any rate.

As I was about to say when interrupted, some years ago when the scandal of the allowances for wood, &c., had come to a head, Congress took up that subject and provided that thereafter Army officers should not be allowed commutation of wood, but that they should pay $3 a cord for their wood uniformly, which is much less than it costs the Government. Now, the Senator from Illinois proposes to restore that old allowance of wood commutation. That will add about, I should think, an average of $200 a year to the compensation of every officer in the United States Army.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says that it would take 100 cords of wood to come to that. Oh, no! The price fixed now is $3 a cord, and the Government does not pay less than an average of $5 or $6 a cord for wood, and it gives half that to the Army officers now, and the proposition of the Senator from Illinois is to give them the remaining half. When you come to take the allowance of the Lieutenant-General, the major-generals, and the brigadier-generals, and then apply it to the retired-list as well, for they will get the benefit of this, you will find that it will add at least $200 to the allowances of every officer in the Army. Now, just look at it! At a time like this, with no necessity pressing upon us, with not a single thing for these men to do hardly except of a police character—I know they would do more if they had it to do—but with nothing military for them to do, here is a bill which proposes to increase their pay, and they are already getting from two to four times more than the officers of any other army in the world.

Mr. LOGAN. I am afraid the Senator does not understand that provision. The law that was passed reorganizing the Army and fixing the pay of officers of the Army provided that fuel should be given to them in kind. Afterward it was changed on an appropriation bill to so much a cord for wood.

Mr. PLUMB. No, it was changed providing that they should buy their wood, but might buy it at the price of $3 a cord.

Mr. LOGAN. It was changed so that they should purchase wood at $3 a cord. Here are officers living in Washington city, quite a number of them. They are allowed so much a cord for wood. But take an officer out on the plains, where there is no wood, where it costs from $8 to $10 a cord, and he must pay that for wood.

Mr. PLUMB. I beg your pardon; he pays $3 a cord.

Mr. LOGAN. He furnishes it——

Mr. PLUMB. The Government furnishes it at $3 a cord.

Mr. LOGAN. Suppose the Government can not furnish it. There are places where he must have it. This provides that the Government shall furnish the fuel—that is all there is to it—so as to equalize the men who are away out far in the West, where it is almost impossible to get wood, with the officers here. The provision is that the Government shall furnish to the officers at posts and other places wood the same as in Washington. That is all there is in that provision of the bill. It only equalizes it and makes it just.

Mr. PLUMB. The Government does not pay in wood to anybody in Washington city. It furnishes to the man in Washington city the amount he requires at $3 a cord, and it furnishes everybody else at the same price, making it an absolutely equal provision, because every man pays the same price. Now, the Government can buy it wherever the officer can buy it. In the event that an officer gets somewhere where the Government can not furnish wood of course he can not get it himself.

Mr. LOGAN. Now I will show the Senator, or at least I will try to show, the injustice of the provision that was put in an appropriation bill. I draughted a bill myself which passed the House fixing the pay of Army officers at so much per annum, which they all fought at the time, but they now say is the best bill they ever had, because it is easy to regulate it. They do not have to certify to forty things every day, but just make out an account so much a month. In that bill it was provided that they should receive forage and fuel in kind, that the Government should furnish them forage and fuel. Afterward, for some reason or other which I will not discuss, that was changed on an appropriation bill to the proposition that the Senator speaks of.

Now the trouble is that in some parts of the West—I know it to be so—to furnish the officer wood in a very cold climate in the mountains is almost impossible. What do they do? They weigh the wood; take a certain character of wood and weigh that, and then they estimate a cord by weight. Of light pine wood it would take two cords to make one. In that way the Government is swindled out of half the money. I make the proposition in order to change that and save the Government.

Mr. PLUMB. This takes from the Government all the money. I admit that the present arrangement is bad. The officer ought to be required to furnish his own wood, the same as anybody else. This proposes to take away from the Government even the protection of $3 a cord and make it pay the whole. I think the officers ought to pay it all. But, as I said, this is part of a scheme to add to the cost of the Army by giving these people their wood entire. An officer comes to Washington now, and all he will have to do will be to go to the wood contractor and give him a receipt for the wood and take the money. Under this provision an Army officer could get almost his entire room-rent at a hotel under the head of "wood," and that was the abuse which Congress intended to cut off and did cut off measurably by the act of 1873.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the special order for to-day, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution relative to the appointment of a commission charged with the consideration and settlement of the fishing rights of the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. LOGAN. I should be very glad if the Senate would agree to dispose of the Army bill. I certainly do not wish to detain them very long, but I should like to have the bill disposed of. I have been very patient about it, and have given way to everything that has been asked; but I should like to have it disposed of, and I wish the Senate would allow it to go on. We certainly can conclude it in a short time. Let us get rid of it one way or the other.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Senator move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT. I am interested as he is in this bill, but I desire very much at this time to get up the bill for the admission of Washington Territory as a State.

Mr. TELLER. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut to let me make a statement in reference to the Army bill.

Mr. PLATT. I suggest that we take up the Washington bill and then we can attend to the other matter.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to the bill being taken up.

ADMISSION OF WASHINGTON TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PLATT. Now, I have no objection to this being laid aside informally.

JAMES'S CREEK CANAL.

Mr. BUTLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be requested to furnish the Senate with an estimate of the cost of dredging James Creek Canal from Virginia avenue to the Eastern Branch, so as to place the said canal in a thoroughly sanitary condition.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. LOGAN. I move——

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator to allow me to make a statement.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who takes some interest in the Army bill, said to me that he was obliged to be absent at present. He desires to be heard further on the bill. I said certainly no vote could be taken during the morning hour, and he has gone away with the understanding, I suppose, that the bill would go over.

Mr. LOGAN. I have something to do with this bill and I do not know why I should always be appealed to to pass over everything that I have charge of. I can not understand it. I have done so all winter. I move that the Senate continue the consideration of the Army bill until it is finished.

Mr. PLATT. Let the Senator move to lay aside the Washington bill.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, I move to lay that aside informally.

Mr. PLATT. Ask unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope I shall have unanimous consent.

Mr. TELLER. I have sent for the Senator from Maine.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent of the Senate informally to lay aside the pending order and continue the consideration of the bill relative to the efficiency of the Army.

Mr. HARRIS. Did I understand the Senator from Colorado to say that the Senator from Maine had expressed a desire to be further heard upon the Army bill?

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Maine said to me he desired to be heard on the bill. I said to him that it would not be disposed of during the morning hour, because I knew the Senator on the floor was likely to continue, and I intended to make some brief remarks on it myself, and supposed others would, and he went away. I have sent for him, but I do not know whether I shall be able to find him or not.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Colorado know when the Senator from Maine will return to the Senate?

Mr. TELLER. I do not. Mr. Christie said he thought he could find him.

Mr. LOGAN. He will be here after a while. If not, I shall not ask for a vote in his absence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and Senate bill No. 777 is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 777) to increase the efficiency of the Army of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. Mr. President, it would be supposed that somewhere in a bill to increase the efficiency of the Army, embracing six pages and sixteen sections, would be something which curtailed some privilege or cut off some pay, or something of that kind; but on a careful examination I find that there is hardly a section that does not increase in some way the expense of the Army and increase its privileges. I find in section 13—

That the Secretary of War be and hereby is, authorized to cause the enlistment of competent instructors for post schools, who shall have the rank and pay of ordnance sergeants.

According to this bill an ordnance sergeant is to have $34 a month, I think.

Mr. LOGAN. That is correct.

Mr. PLUMB. Then he has a ration and a half, which makes him more expensive than a private soldier, and he has his clothing and fuel besides. So, if the average pay to the private soldier is a thousand dollars, the pay of an ordance sergeant will be somewhat in excess of that. It is safe to say it will be that much anyhow. I imagine that some of the school teachers who will be employed under the Blair bill would be glad to have this thousand dollars pay. They would be glad to be employed as post instructors under this provision. It will be noticed, too, that this rather extraordinary provision does not limit the number. The Secretary can employ just as many as he pleases. He can have just as many schools as he sees fit, and for every school an instructor, and just as many more instructors than one as he chooses to employ. While I do not suppose that the present Secretary, or any other Secretary, will employ any more men than he deems to be necessary for the Army service, at the same time it is rather an extraordinary grant of power.

But whom are we going to teach? The private soldiers of the Army, men of twenty-one years and upward, men nineteen-twentieths of whom can already read and write, who have already had all the instruction in the common schools of the country which the law imposes the duty upon the Government to furnish to anybody. I know there is an ameliorating influence about a school established at a post, although as far as my observation goes such schools are not very numerously attended; but the men who ought to teach them are the officers of the garrison. One difficulty with the Army to-day is the fact that there is a wide, fixed, and impassable gulf between the private soldiers and the officers, which would be in a measure closed by compelling the officers themselves to instruct the men in the evenings whom during the day they command. It would be a sensible and a useful provision of law that wherever post schools are established they should be taught by the officers of the garrison themselves. But at this late day with the design, I suppose, of sand-papering and varnishing and fixing up this Army of ours and make it still more respectable, they have got a Blair bill here in minature, a provision for instructors to be appointed at will by the Secretary of War at a cost of a thousand dollars apiece to instruct the men of twenty-one years of age and over who compose the private soldiers of the regular Army. When I consider that there are already supported some forty-odd different bands in the Army by money out of which the private soldier is swindled, it seems to me we might find a committee of this body somewhere that would take into consideration some of the abuses of the Army rather than exhaust themselves with a bill of this kind for the purpose of adding to its privileges.

Getting along a little further, I find in section 16 what appears to be a fitting finale to this bill. About 1873 there occurred in the Army of the United States a defalcation of an extraordinary character. A man named Hodges, a paymaster stationed in this city, was found short in his accounts some four or five hundred thousand dollars. It caused Congress to look into the system of accounts in the Pay Department, the mode of inspection, &c., and as the result of that Congress passed the following law, approved April 20, 1874, chapter 117 of the acts of 1873–'74.

An act to provide for the inspection of the disbursements of appropriations made by officers of the Army.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause frequent inquiries to be made as to the necessity, economy, and propriety of all disbursements made by disbursing officers of the Army, and as to their strict conformity to the law appropriating the money; also to ascertain whether the disbursing officers of the Army comply with the law in keeping their accounts and making their deposits; such inquiries to be made by officers of the inspection department of the Army, or others detailed for that purpose: Provided, That no officer so detailed shall be in any way connected with the department or corps making the disbursement.

Under the system which obtained at the time of the Hodge defalcation, and which made that defalcation possible, every paymaster was inspected by his fellow-paymaster and by nobody else. Congress came to the rescue, and said in view of that great defalcation it would establish a rule which as nearly as any rule could do so should prevent that hereafter. The result was the statute failed.

Now, we have had twelve or thirteen years of administration of the pay corps without any defalcation, and the bill under consideration not only provides a repeal of that law, but affimatively says that the Pay Corps shall inspect itself. If there is anything in human nature, the passage of this bill ought to be the beginning of defalcations in the Pay Department. Section 16 of the bill is as follows:

SEC. 16. That hereafter the inspections made of paymasters' accounts, offices, their duties, &c., shall be made—

"Shall be made," mind you—

by officers of the Pay Department detailed for that purpose by the Secretary of War, such detail among paymasters not to be continued for more than one year; other paymasters shall be detailed, and so on, in each year alternating the detail.

The Secretary of War is not authorized to do as he would like to do about it perhaps; he is not authorized to select at will; but the wholesome provision of the law of 1874, enacted in the face of the great Hodge defalcation, is not only to be stricken down, but the Secretary is not to have the option to appoint disinterested people to inspect the paymasters, but has got to select men from among themselves.

Mr. President, there ought to be such a thing as official accountability. There can be no more useful law than that which enforces that accountability at all points and everywhere. There can be no greater travesty on law than that which deliberately relieves and takes away the accountability now provided.

Under the law as it now is, what happens? Wherever the paymasters are stationed, at department headquarters or other places where an inspection officer is stationed, this officer inspects the pay officer. That costs the Government nothing; it is inexpensive, and more than all that it is disinterested.

Now, what would happen under the bill? It would be a very nice thing in the eye of an Army officer, and if there is any one who can frame more ways of getting on nice details and into snug berths and getting perquisites and so on than an Army officer I have yet to discover him. Under the bill the Secretary of War would detail a man from the Pay Corps to inspect the whole number of paymasters. He can only stay in the detail one year, and the next year he is to be not inspector but inspectee; he is to be inspected by some man whom he in turn has inspected. Of course with his detail would come a round-the-country tour of duty, to go to all the places where the paymasters would be inspected, to have a jaunt, or what is known in the Congressional vocabulary as a junket.

That would be bad enough, it is expensive, but fundamentally the objection is that the inspection is not and can not possibly be disinterested. It is to be made by a man, as I said, who not only belongs to the corps which he is inspecting but who is himself to be inspected the next year by some man whom he has inspected, and there is not only all the opportunity but all the possible inducement there ever can be for collusion between the officers of the corps, to see that the inspection is not what the law contemplates it shall be. This is not different from the system which was in vogue at the time of the Hodge defalcation, and under which the Government lost $400,000 or $500,000, as it might be expected to lose under a system so lax as that.

It has been stated by the Senator from Illinois in effect that opposition to this bill is opposition to him. That left the matter in a very awkward position for me, and I at first thought I would not speak upon it. It has been stated further that this bill comes from a committee of this body, composed of men the majority of whom have served in the armies of the United States or in the armies of the confederacy, men who are acquainted with the details of army organization, with its needs, and so on, and that therefore the measure is entitled to great respect. That is true. There is not a member of that committee for whom I have not the profoundest respect—I hope I am not lacking in respect for any member of this body—but I claim to have some self-respect and some sense of duty, and no committee can bind me in regard to matters of public policy. If this were a mere question of detail, of the position relatively or actually of companies in the regiment, of the rank or relative rank of men who command in the regiment, be they lieutenants, captains, majors, colonels, or what not, I would yield in deference to the authority of that committee; but here are half a dozen matters of public policy which the report of no committee can obscure or render otherwise than of the greatest possible importance.

I know the Senator from Illinois is swift to say that is demagogy; that we are not here to legislate for the great masses of the people who pay these taxes; but with not even that decent regard which we ought to have for the trust, we vote money practically without any reason being given for it, because no reason has been proffered why the pay or emolument of the Army should be increased. Are they resigning? The Senator from Illinois said he did not wonder that they resigned. I have not heard any thunder from that source. Who has resigned? There are not vacancies enough in the Army of the United States to-day to take up the seventy-one young men who graduate in June at West Point. We have passed a bill to make twenty-odd new places in the Army in order that those seventy young men may be appointed.

Mr. COCKRELL. We made twenty-odd new places.

Mr. PLUMB. Yes, in order that those young men may be appointed. That does not indicate that there is anything of what my colleague would call "tumultuous haste" to get out of the Army. On the contrary, I say it is the easiest, the snuggest, and the best-paid berth there is in the service of the United States; and yet we are proposing to add not only to the pay of private soldiers and the non-commissioned staff all the way through, but to add an average of at least $200 to the compensation of every officer in the Army.

More than all that, to enable them to shirk the duty which they owe to the men whom they command, we propose to authorize the Secretary of War to enlist as many post instructors to instruct the men as he sees fit, making each company a school, and instead of having the school taught by a competent non-commissioned officer or by the officer who commands the company, and who ought to be drawn to it by some tie except that of his salary, we set up a separate establishment, as I said, a school for every company, and this after the generations of experience we have had of the Army; and I will venture to say there is not a well-considered opinion from anybody entitled to speak by authority calling for anything of this kind.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that that provision was inserted in pursuance of a recommendation from the Secretary of War in the last bill and carried over. Secretary Lincoln recommended it, and I reported it in this bill as it was recommended by him. The Military Committee thought it was not wise to recommend so many in the bill, and therefore struck it out, and left the vacancies to be created by the Secretary of War.

Mr. PLUMB. The Secretary of War is not an authority on this subject. He is a civilian, a man really of to-day and not of to-morrow, a man practically possessing no functions concerning the Army. The law gives him some, but he has got to be a man of extraordinary force of character if he ever applies them in any respect to the management of the affairs of the Army. He visés the acts of the General of the Army, but no more controls that great institution than a piece of drift-wood controls the current of the Mississippi River on which it is borne. He registers its decrees and is its servant. He can not be otherwise under the organization of the Army as it is now. He knows he comes in there for a brief period of two or four years, as the case may be, and that then he is to go out inevitably, no matter what may become of the administration. But the General of the Army, the Lieutenant-General, and the major-generals are there for life; they impress themselves upon the Army. It is an indurated machine which the Secretary of War can not move, and which he can only touch in order to be crushed.

In addition to all this, when we come to the disbursement of all the $40,000,000 that go to make up the pay-roll of the Army, we strike down that wise provision of law enacted in the face of a public emergency whereby the inspection of the Army officers' accounts shall be from disinterested quarters and put the inspection of the paymasters' accounts and all of their affairs into the hands of the corps itself, in order that there will be no let or hinderance to exercise their sweet will in what they will do with the public money. These, as I said, are questions of public policy; they are questions on which the report of no committee binds me, whatever it may do for any other member of the Senate. I wish to say on that point, because this has been brought to my attention in a variety of ways, that when I report a bill here, or when one comes from a committee of which I am a member, if a Senator on this floor withholds any criticism which he deems to be due, he has failed in his duty and not I in mine.

Mr. LOGAN obtained the floor.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. LOGAN. I will give way to any Senator. I wish to get the bill through.

Mr. HALE. I was out of the Chamber a little while ago when the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] gave way upon the order of business he was moving. He told me this morning that he intended at 2 o'clock to go on, if the Senate should so permit, with the Washington bill, and I supposed the Army measure would go over. I desire to speak briefly in favor of my amendment at the close of the debate, but I am not prepared, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, to go on to-day. On the intimation of the Senator from Connecticut I did not suppose that the Army bill would be proceeded with after 2 o'clock.

Mr. LOGAN. There will be plenty of time for the Senator to speak.

Mr. HALE. Another reason is that some Senators desire an executive session at an early hour. I wish to know whether the Senator from Illinois expects to get a vote to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know whether I shall get a vote to-day or not. I propose to reply briefly to some of the remarks which have been made, and it will then be for the Senate to determine upon its course.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). The Senator from Maine has the floor.

Mr. HALE. I am not prepared now to go on. I suppose by common consent whenever the time comes for a vote on the pending question, the bill may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no objection to that whatever.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words, and only a few, upon the bill, suggested by the course which the debate has taken rather than by any assumption on my part of ability to discuss the details of the bill, or the details of the organization of the Army, or its administration.

I would not assume to criticise this measure or to support it. In a general way I am disposed to follow committees in the recommendations which they make to the Senate from sheer necessity largely, and especially the recommendations of the Committee on Military Affairs, constituted as it is and having jurisdiction of matters so little within the scope of my own study and practical knowledge. I should think it presumption on my part to undertake to discuss the details of this measure. Whether a paymaster's accounts shall be inspected by one officer of the Army or another is a matter which I shall leave to the chairman of the committee to tell me which, in his opinion, is the wisest; or whether the officers upon the frontier, in the application of the rules heretofore established as to their rations and as to their fuel, suffer in comparison with the officers at the Capitol, I do not presume to know as well as the Senator from Illinois and his committee, and such a recommendation as they shall make commends itself to me more strongly than any criticism which shall come of such features of the bill from those who are less known to be familiar with the workings of the details of the Army.

Upon some features of the bill, however, I have an opinion, and that opinion I shall venture to express. We have the framework of an army for thirty thousand men. We had the limitation of thirty thousand men in the adoption of the Revised Statutes; and since, from time to time, in appropriation acts and by transient measures, limited in their application to the Army as a whole, we have, leaving the framework as it is, brought down the rank and file so that the whole Army shall not exceed twenty-five thousand men. We have left the skeleton, we have left the detail, we have left the outside shell, and we have from time to time diminished the numbers of the Army from thirty thousand to twenty-five thousand. Whether it be wise to fill up the companies and regiments and make the organization what it was designed to be, full, complete, and efficient as an organization of that kind should be, or whether we shall continue from time to time to diminish the numbers in detail and leave the framework and all the paraphernalia and machinery of the Army as it is is not a question, it seems to me, that depends upon whether we shall have a great standing army or a small standing army. It is the difference between thirty thousand men and twenty-five thousand men, with the same organization, and with the same outside and the same machinery. The question to me is whether it were better to have it a complete organization under that limit, or whether we shall continue to diminish it by diminishing the number of the rank and file. It is not the question whether filling up with the number of five thousand which have been taken from time to time out of the ranks is endangering the liberties of this country. It does not strike me so. Perhaps it does not strike me so because I have no knowledge at all of army matters.

I do not think whether we shall add $900,000 or a million and a half dollars to the expenses of the Army by thus rounding it out to its proper proportions is a question that ought to shake the very foundations of our institutions, and be a departure from well-established policy of administration. I do not think the question whether our institutions depend upon the will of the people for their support or peace is to be established from within or from without, is to be settled by any such comparatively small item in an army bill. It does not strike me that there is any such great question involved in this matter.

But if the policy which has been suggested on different sides of this Chamber, by which the peace of this country is to be maintained, is to be adopted as the policy of the country, if what I heard the other day in this discussion from a Senator who said he spoke as a friend of the administration is to be the established policy of this Government, I for one would be for an increase of the Army over and above thirty thousand limit; for to my mind it is clear that if that policy is to be adopted there will be need of a greater army than we have had for many a year since the close of the war.

When those who advocated the filling up of the regiments spoke of the need of this supply of men to maintain peace upon the border, to keep the Indian in subjection and the settler in security, we were told that all that had better be turned over to the cowboy, and that he keep the peace of this country as between the Indian and the white man. The cowboy was told in this Chamber that he is himself a part of the Army of this country, and is now subject to the command of the President as Commander-in-Chief, and but offer a reward of $500 for the scalp of an Indian and the cowboy would take up the business of preserving the peace of this country in the matter, in the method of exterminating the Indian when he breaks out in open hostility!

Could I believe that that is the policy of this administration I for one would be for the increase of the Army much more than is contemplated in this bill. But it is because I do not believe that to be the policy of this administration, it is because I believe that this administration, as past administrations, have seen that instead of trusting the peace of this country to the cowboy, they have found a better way of maintaining the peace upon the borders of the country, because this administration is actuated by the spirit which prompted one of its Cabinet officers to tell a committee of those men when they applied to him to have the Indians upon a reservation disarmed that there was more need of disarming the cowboy than there was of disarming the Indian, that I do not see the necessity of any increase of the Army because of any apprehension of an outbreak among the Indians.

Sir, they begin to see more clearly every day wherein peace with the white man lies. They have felt all along that war with the white man has been fatal to them; that it is extermination on their part; and avoiding it as well as they could in their benighted life they have known that war whenever it has broken out has meant extermination; and now that they begin to see that through the arts of peace there is to come to them protection as well against the cowboy as against the outbreak of any other portion of the people, peace with the Indians is assured. Their children in the schools, on the reservations and off the reservations, are hostages of peace. They know that with war come to them desolation and spoliation. They understand it better than they did, and there is no occasion to increase the Army from any apprehension of any trouble with the Indian on the border. Let the white man study justice to the Indian and the Indian will keep peace with him in observing justice with the white man.

But he from whom the Indian has the most to fear, he from whom the Government has the most to fear in disturbing the relations which now exist on the borders between the white man and the Indian, is that very man who has been told in this Chamber that he is an Army officer or an Army private, ready and authorized as an Army officer is to keep the peace, and to encourage him in this work of extermination it is suggested to him that for the better keeping of the peace it may be well to offer a reward for the scalp of every Indian which shall be brought in. So long as we teach that doctrine we shall be called upon and compelled to increase the Army in order to maintain the peace, disturbed as the peace of the country is surely to be under such teachings as that.

We are told that there are disturbances elsewhere as well as on the border. I can understand the sensitiveness of those who people the Western States extending on the borders of the Indian settlements and reservations. I can understand very well, although I have never lived there, their anxiety that nothing shall be done which shall disturb the now existing peaceful relations between them and the Indians; and I can understand how natural it is for them to look to the Army as the great source of protection, under the shelter of which they can live in peace and in quiet. But the relations between them and the Indian of to-day are quite different from what they were in years past. Coming the better to understand each other, they are coming to feel on both sides greater security and a belief in the future common prosperity of all who live on the border and beyond the border on the reservations. They are coming to look to the education, to the industry, to the cultivation of the soil, to the manifold ways in which the Indian shall be employed, so that he may have as little time as he may have inducement to turn to the ways of violence for either support or redress of imagined injuries.

But there are those who think that there is a necessity for an increase of the Army beyond filling up to the limit of thirty thousand the present Army because of disturbances that are seen and that are troubling the public mind throughout the country at the present time. Sir, I do not see any need of an army for any such purpose as that. There are disturbances in the country; there is a great army of discontented people, some of them discontented with the relations which exist between them as employés and their employers; there is a greater army of people in distress, in want, in discontent at the restraints of law imposed under the institutions and the policy of the Government under which they live; but those disturbances are not to be settled by outside pressure and force. A government resting upon the will and the voice of the people must find repose in and through and by the people alone. It can never stand if it depends upon force from without for its support. Take away the causes of discontent, and discontent itself will disappear. Open up to those out of employment the manifold ways of employment all around them, see to it that the labor of this country shall be for the laborer of this country alone; see to it that he who performs the labor throughout this country shall reap an honest, full, and fair compensation for the labor which he performs; see to it that the profit which shall come out of the manifold industries throughout this country shall be shared justly between him who furnishes the capital and him who toils at the loom and at the plow and in the mechanic shop, and you take away the causes of discontent.

If the spirit which is now troubling the people with disturbance shall be displaced with hope, with inspiration, with strength, with vigor, there will come with that peace repose and harmony between capital and labor, and there is no more need of an army. An outside army under those circumstances would be a curse, and would bring, instead of peace, commotion and strife and distress. Let us find some other ground for increasing the Army beyond the limit of twenty-five thousand men than in any idea that we can meet the demands of this hour by any such thing as outside force. It is to come through reason, through change of policy, through encouragement to those who are honestly striving not only to earn that upon which they must subsist, but to make provision for those who are to come after them, for education, for competence, and for comfort, in homes such as these institutions of ours entitle them to.

Sir, it is administration and policy to which we ought to address ourselves, and not to the idea that anything in the present condition of affairs in this country demands any increase of outside force by which to control this. It is to be controlled by self-constraint, coming from consciousness that those who are now without employment, those who are now shut out by policy or by law from a just share in the wages of their labor—from these sources is to come all that in our internal concerns is called for at the present hour.

So long as we maintain the framework of this Army for thirty thousand men I would fill it up to thirty thousand men; I would not emasculate and weaken it. We shall have enough to do with an army of thirty thousand without troubling ourselves with what we shall do with our own people under it. Let us maintain our influence with the nations of the earth; let us assert our American policy, American as well in our commercial relations as in the fact that the labor of this country belongs to the laborers of this country. Then there will be reason enough why an army of thirty thousand strong will be needed, and it will be more efficient and more entitled to be the Army of the United States than it is now.

There is a great deal about the detail of the administration open to such criticism as has been made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] this morning, but I shall not go myself to a newspaper correspondent of the Old World for light upon that subject. I think I will take the lead of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] before I will take up that of Archibald Forbes, a newspaper correspondent. I think I will take the lead of officers of the Army, General Sheridan and those associated with him, before I will take the guide of the men who criticise the Army in the way that has been shown to-day. I am for filling up the Army to its original limit; I am for making it the Army of the United States, and I am for using it when it is made in asserting the American name, the American power, and the American policy throughout the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, the question whether the Army ought to be increased or maintained at its present number it seems to me is not one that requires a great deal of skill or a great deal of talk. If there is a necessity for the increase of the Army, if it is not large enough to perform every function that is left to the Army to perform, either in peace or in war, the Government of the United States is abundantly able to have an army of that kind. Such an army would not be hostile to liberty; it would not endanger the institutions of this country. But we have not any such proposition made to the Senate to-day. On the contrary, it is not asserted by anybody on this floor that the American Army for the last ten years has not been sufficient in numbers, sufficient in courage, sufficient in everything to discharge the functions that under the law are placed upon the Army. There is nobody here now demanding an increase of the Army except the Military Committee of this body. The proposition has not the sanction of the Executive, it has not the sanction of the Secretary of War, it has not the sanction of the commanding general of the Army.

Yet the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] says that he is willing to make the Army effective. Who on this floor says that the Army is not effective? Who says anywhere that it is not effective? Nobody. It is not worth while then to discuss the question whether putting five thousand more men into the Army will make it effective or not when it is admitted by all that it is effective now. For the purposes for which armies are created, everybody understands that fifty thousand men are better than twenty-five thousand, and I suppose that thirty thousand are better than twenty-five thousand; that is to say, for the purposes of war; but are we threatened with war? Have we any reason to anticipate war on our frontier? The Senator from Massachusetts, who says he is in favor of putting in five thousand more men, tells us that there is no danger of an Indian war; that he does not anticipate any. I know it was said here the other day by two Senators that there was perhaps some danger of Indian wars, and that it was wise and proper to increase the Army so that in case there should be a difficulty of that kind a settler could have protection. The settler was in danger ten or fifteen years ago. He is not in danger to-day, for the two reasons that I spoke of the other day; first, because of the changed condition of the Indian himself, and largely and more so because of the changed condition of his surroundings. I do not believe that to-day a man acquainted with the military affairs of this Government can be found—I mean an official charged with the execution of military affairs—who will put himself on record as saying that for the purpose of Indian wars there is necessity for more men in the Army.

If not for Indian wars, then for what kind of wars? As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] said the other day, if we are tempting the cupidity of weak nations and inviting attacks upon ourselves by the paucity of the numbers of our Army, thirty thousand men would be a mere nothing. What is the difference between a contest with any foreign power with twenty-five thousand men and thirty thousand men? If we want an army for such a purpose we want a large army, and the very argument addressed to the Senate by the Senator from Connecticut and by the Senator from Massachusetts could be addressed to us in favor of a hundred thousand men as well as in favor of thirty thousand men.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who reported this bill, said the other day in reply to the Senator from Maine when the bill was under discussion:

> I want the Senator to understand that this proposition to increase the Army is not for any present needs; it is not because there is an Indian war; it is not because there is danger from Indians or danger from anywhere.

So the chairman of the committee has admitted upon this floor the efficiency, and the complete efficiency, of the American Army for the purpose for which we keep a standing army. I am not particularly squeamish about the Army. I am not afraid of twenty-five thousand men, or thirty thousand men, or a hundred thousand, or a million men. If the United States had a standing army of a million men to-day and had at the head of it the most brilliant man of the age, I do not believe they could destroy the liberties of sixty million people. I am not alarmed about that. But it is contrary to the spirit of republican institutions that the Army should be relied upon for the protection of the people except as against foreign foes. The Army is not a police force, and whenever it is used as a police power it is used under a provision of the Constitution which authorizes the governor of a State to call upon the General Government for assistance, or else it is used in violation of law. It is the duty of each State to keep peace within her borders. It is the duty of the State to select her constabulary, her police force, and to maintain order within her borders; and she has a right only to call upon the National Government when such a condition amounts in fact to a revolution within her borders.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] well characterized and well described the condition we should be in in this country if we relied upon the National Government for assistance in times of domestic trouble in the States. If there is a riot in the city of Chicago, who ought to put it down? Who are interested in putting it down? The people of the State of Illinois. They have the machinery, and they have the power, and they have the right to put it down; and when that passes beyond their control, when they have exhausted their power, then and then only may they call upon the General Government according to the genius of our institutions.

The Army is an expense. The expense was $25,000,000 last year for the military establishment alone and two and a half million dollars or thereabouts for other expenses connected therewith, making $27,000,000 or $28,000,000 for the purpose of maintaining the Army. As I said the other day, it is the maintenance of a corps of men who are not producers, who go into the field not as the creators of wealth but as its destroyers, who are withdrawn from the productive energies of the people for the purpose either of destroying or living in idleness, hoping perhaps, some of them at least, for an opportunity to distinguish themselves, at the best in these days, with practically no possibility of their being needed beyond the service that they have been performing for the last ten years.

The revenues of the Government are steadily decreasing, the expenditures are steadily increasing; and yet with a declaration of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whose knowledge ought to be as good as anybody's upon that question, that an addition to the Army is not needed for present use, we are asked to add $2,000,000 under any circumstances, and in all probability much more, to the expenses of the country upon either one of two theories: either upon the theory of the chairman that we may make a creditable display, or upon the theory of other Senators on this floor that we may use the Army as a police force.

A standing provision of law inserted in 1878 in the statutes provides that the Army can not be used as a police force, that it can not be used to maintain the local authorities, the constabulary of the country, except there is a provision of law to that effect in the statutes. It will be impossible practically, then, to use the Army for that purpose if we desire to do so. But do we desire it? Is there anybody here who will stand on this Senate floor and say that he is willing that it should be understood to-day that we are increasing the Army of the United States for the purpose suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK]? I do not believe there is. The chairman has disavowed it, everybody would disavow it; and if you do not need it for that, for what purpose do you need it unless it is to make a display?

I said that the revenues were decreasing and the expenditures increasing. I have looked over the estimates for 1887, and I find that they are $51,000,000 more than the appropriations made for 1886. The estimates for 1887 are several million dollars in excess of the estimates made for 1886, for the appropriations, of course, did not come up fully to the estimates. Why, then, should we add to the burdens of the people by putting on two or three or more million dollars expense when the people have not required it, when the military authorities do not ask it, when the friends of the measure stand here and declare themselves that it is not needed, and that it is only for the purpose of a show and a display?

It is practically impossible in the nature of things in this country to use an army of any magnitude properly. We shall do just as we have been doing—keep men at out-of-the-way posts, keep them wherever the Government has barracks in which they can be put, without reference to the place where they might possibly be needed.

On the contrary, instead of requiring more men, there is not any question but that by a proper administration of the Army it might be cut down thousands of men and yet be efficient and valuable for every purpose for which the people of the United States intend that their Army shall be used. They do not intend that the Army of the United States shall be a police force; they do not intend, even if discontent is rife in the great cities, that that discontent shall be stamped out by national troops; and nobody is clearer from intending that than the members of the Senate, irrespective of party, to-day. Such a proposition on this floor would not get, in my judgment, a solitary vote. Then we need not discuss that phase of the question, for nobody proposes to so use the Army. We need not discuss it with reference to the Indians, for the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs declares that it is not needed; and we are left to meet the people of the United States with an increase of the Army, with adding to the public burdens that they are bearing, simply and solely and only that the officers may make a creditable display, and that they may take pride when they go upon parade in the number of the men and the efficiency with which they trim to the line and wheel to the right and left.

No money has ever been voted in this country upon a declaration of that kind, and I think the Senator or the member who goes out and meets the people with a declaration that he has voted away two million and more of their money for such a purpose will find at least that the people of the United States with their ordinary good judgment are not in love with such a display of statesmanship either here or anywhere else.

Whenever it is shown that the Army is not effective, that more men are needed for the legitimate uses of the Army, I shall vote to add all that are required. I shall vote for everything that is presented to the Senate that goes to make the country strong and great; but I shall vote for nothing for display. When there are a million men tramping the fields to-day looking for work, when in every department of life there is, if not death at least stagnation, when business is paralyzed, when all departments of business are but just living, I shall not vote to add to the burdens of the people unless I can see a direct and positive return for their interest. I shall vote for public works. I would vote to take these $2,000,000 and put them in a canal to connect the Mississippi River with the lakes; I would vote them to clear out and make navigable the great rivers of the country; because every dollar that is thus paid is paid to the laboring man. I would vote these millions to build a ship, because 95 per cent. of it would go into the laboring man's pocket. But I will not vote a dollar simply to maintain an army of the United States, admitted not to be needed, for the glorification only of the officers and to pander to the pride of the people who will say, "Behold, what a great army we have got!"

It is ill-timed, in my judgment, to attempt expenditures of this kind, and I regret that from the Military Committee, or any other, such a proposition should come to the American Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I did not intend to detain the Senate on this question further than I had done this morning, but since listening to one very extraordinary speech, and a supplement to it also, I deem it proper that I should at least defend my own position in reference to this bill; and if I can have the attention of the Senate I shall make the propositions in the bill so clear that I think the arguments which have been made against it will fall harmless at the feet of those who made them.

The Senator who has just taken his seat [Mr. TELLER] followed in the wake of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB] in quoting what I said about the immediate wants of the Army, and on that based an argument in opposition to bedecking the Army with gauze and tinsel for the purpose of pleasing and delighting some fond lookers-on. I neither said nor did I intend any such thing. I said there was no immediate necessity for an army. What do I mean by that? I mean that there is no war existing now. The same argument might be made applicable to the Army as it now is. If what I said in reference to the immediate wants or the necessity for the increase of the Army can be used as an argument against the bill, then the same argument, forsooth, would be good against any army at all.

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator if he will allow me to finish reading the paragraph which I ought to have read.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly I will.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator continued:

It is not because I apprehend any danger from any source that I proposed this in the bill before the Military Committee, and that the Military Committee agreed to it, but it is that the Government of the United States may at least have an army that will have some respectability when it is called the Army of the United States, both at home and abroad.

Mr. LOGAN. I said that, and I will repeat it if the Senator desires. On that the whole argument of the two Senators has been builded—no immediate necessity; but I did say in continuation, as the Senator well knows, that it was for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the organization. This bill was reported for the purpose of increasing the efficiency of the Army. Will any Senator say that an army can present a respectable appearance in a state or condition of inefficiency? It is very easy to take one or two words or sentences in the course of debate and build on them a fabric without any substantial basis.

Mr. President, there seemed to be a desire on the part of the Senator from Kansas, for some reason unknown to me, to present this case before the country in a false light, and no man in the Senate Chamber is more capable of presenting any proposition in a false light than is the Senator from Kansas. He presented the fact of the allowance of meager pay to laboring men as an argument against this army bill—a question that the Congress of the United States can not pass upon; and because there are poor men in the country, therefore you should not pay a poor soldier what he is entitled to! That is the logic of his argument. You must not pay a soldier $16 per month because somebody has got to be taxed to pay that. The Government must not pay a price that is fair for the reason that the Government must raise the money. The same argument would apply to the poor laborer of the land laboring for the rich. You must not pay him fair wages. Why? Because you are taxing his employers, making them pay for it. That is the argument precisely. Now, the argument that I make in favor of paying the poor soldier a reasonable price will apply to the laborer as well.

Mr. President, it is strange, and yet it is true, that you find men of wealth, bankers, &c., some of them who have amassed great wealth so that they count by the millions, almost invariably claiming to be the friend of the poor man. If you find a man who runs two or three banks he is surely the friend of the poor man; and yet the poor man is taxed to death; the poor man is trampled in the ground; but I who was reared on a farm and taught to labor from my childhood—and what little I have accomplished in life, and that is not much, has been by hard work—I am to be placed by the Senator as no friend to the laboring man.

No, Mr. President, it is the banker, the man of wealth, the rich man, who is the friend of the poor man and laborer. I do not complain at this, but merely call attention to a statement ever made. But, sir, when any man insinuates in this Chamber or elsewhere that I am not the friend of, and do not sympathize with, the poor man as well as he, he casts an insinuation not justified by the facts.

But the Senator from Kansas said I was willing to vote five or seven million dollars for show. What kind of show? I am not in the habit of exhibiting myself for show. I am not fond of show, never have been and never expect to be. Why should I vote the money of the people for show? No, sir; my proposition is to vote the money of the people to make the present organization of the Army efficient. Sir, men who rise in this world by trying to tear down others, men who live by assailing the honest motives of other men, live a life that I hope they may enjoy, but one that I do not wish to follow myself.

Why not argue this question on a fair basis? Why insinuate that there is a motive underneath this proposition in order to cause, if possible, unwarranted reflections by his constituents on the action of one who at least has the reputation of being actuated by as honest motives as he who makes the insinuations?

The Senator says in substance, Oh, but the day in which the American people saw their glory, the day in which peace spread her wings from one end of this land to the other, the day in which comfort and happiness came to the whole American people, was the day on which the troops marched down Pennsylvania avenue when the war had closed. Sir, the Senator spoke of volunteers; in fact, he criticised the regular Army, their officers and all connected with them, their desire to be in Washington city—all this was the subject of criticism by the able Senator from Kansas; and yet he said this country must rely upon its citizens, that if when the war commenced we had disbanded the regular Army and composed the whole military force of volunteers it would have been much better for the country. I will not discuss with him on that point. I think he is mistaken, but we will have no controversy over that.

But while he so delighted himself and his auditors with his compliments to the volunteer soldier, to the man who had gone because of his love of country to preserve and protect it, why does he, when he speaks of the armies that passed down Pennsylvania avenue, mention no man's name except that of those who were high in the regular Army? And he even made a mistake in that statement. He spoke of the army of Grant, the army of Sheridan, Sherman, Thomas, and the army of Hancock having marched down Pennsylvania avenue. The army of Hancock did not march down Pennsylvania avenue. General Hancock was a noble man and a brave soldier—no braver, in my judgment, ever drew a blade on the battlefield—but he was not then in command of an army and never was. He was not in command of an army or corps. He was in command of Washington. Nor did the army of Thomas; it was not then nor had it ever been in Washington city. So the Senator was mistaken in his history. Sir, a man who professes to know so much about armies and yet knows so little ought at least to allow other people to have some opinions. I was present on that day, but I was a volunteer and not to be counted or mentioned; yet I commanded a large army that marched down Pennsylvania avenue on that day, but the Senator of course could not mention a poor volunteer. The fact that the Army of the Tennessee had over sixty thousand men, the most of them for duty, was and is a small matter—that they were present and marched down the avenue at that time. I merely mention this to show how easy it is for a person to overlook small things.

But the Senator says the British Government pays the men in its army but a shilling a day; therefore, I suppose, we should pay a shilling a day; that when not in active service they receive sixpence a day; therefore, I suppose, we should pay sixpence a day. Is this the argument of the Senator? Will any Senator compare the pay of laboring men in this country with the pay of common laborers abroad and draw his conclusion from that, and therefore insist on lower wages for men here? No, Mr. President; I want to pay American soldiers according to the American system and our ideas of pay.

The Senator said that in Germany they have five hundred thousand soldiers, and their pay is only about $120 per annum, and therefore we must presume that we should pay the same. Is that it? England, as the Senator said, pays a shilling a day to its private soldiers. Mr. President, our poor soldiers would be filled with gladness and great joy if the Senator from Kansas could carry out the idea of economy that his remarks would indicate. How they would call him their friend who had defended their rights when he claimed here on the floor of the Senate that because England paid but a shilling a day therefore our soldiers' pay ought to be reduced! And he then accused other Senators of trying to embarrass and impoverish the Government by proposing to pay our soldiers $16 per month. We are not governed by British rules; we are not governed by British law or regulation or system in reference to our Army or in reference to our labor. We are governed by that principle which we think ought to govern us as Americans.

I would like to see the laboring man get good pay for every stroke he makes with his good right arm, and I want to see the soldier get good pay for all the service that he performs for the Government. He counted it up and said the pay, clothing, rations, and allowances of a private soldier amounted to a thousand dollars a year. The Senator knows better than that, I think. The soldiers' pay as the law now is, without increased pay, is $156. Then he has his rations and his clothing, which amount to $109. This, together with his pay, amounts to $265. Under the present bill, if passed, his pay, including rations and clothing, will be $301. The Senator from Kansas says a thousand dollars a year per soldier is the expense, and therefore he argues that the soldiers net that amount in pay, rations, and clothing.

Now, sir, let me show how unfair the arguments of both Senators are in reference to this matter. The $25,000,000 is for the Army establishment. What does that mean? It means the War Department with all its expenses, clerical force, records, and everything, and West Point with all its expense. This amount includes also the expense of transportation, clothing, forage, horses, pay of officers, and pay of the men. All that is taken into consideration when you say a regiment costs a million dollars a year. Why? Because the $25,000,000 is appropriated for the military establishment, and dividing it up, it makes about that much, applying it to each soldier. Is that a fair estimate? Deduct your West Point expenses; deduct your War Department expenses; deduct your forage and everything except the pay of the soldier, and what is it? The soldier gets no such pay as is charged. He does not get any such proportion as that alleged. His pay is part of the expense of the establishment.

Now, let me go a little further. The Senator from Kansas roamed all through this bill. The truth is that it is the defeat of the bill he desires. It is not the efficiency of the Army that he wishes to promote, but its inefficiency.

I will call your attention to his proposition stated about the schools. He said there was a proposition in the bill to establish schools. We have schools in the Army now. He knows that. This has been recommended by the commanding officers and by Secretaries of War to have instructors appointed in the Army for the schools at the posts. He asks, why teach the soldiers? That is part of it. Why should not the poor soldier have a chance, when he is not on drill or doing duty, to learn to spell, read, and write, if he has not already these advantages? Why should he not? He can not teach himself. The Senator says the officers should do that; that is, the officers must become school-teachers; they must not perform the duty that is assigned them by law, but they must become school-teachers. His idea of a school in the Army would cut off everybody except soldiers. Does he not know that many of the officers in the Army at the posts have families including children? Does he not know that the majority of them are poor and can not send their children back to the States and pay the expense of their schooling? Does he want those children to go without education? Is that his idea? Does he not know that a great many of the private soldiers and sergeants and corporals in the Army are married men, and have their families at the posts? Does he not know that there is not a post in the United States where you will not find quite a number of small children belonging to officers and soldiers, and yet the soldier has no money with which to send his child to school? It is proposed by this bill to pay him $16 a month and no more. He can not afford to educate his child; but the Government must not do it. Why? Because the Senator says here in this bill you allow the Secretary of War to appoint and pay as many instructors as he desires. In other words, he is afraid the Secretary of War will appoint so many instructors that the country will be bankrupt. I have more confidence in the present Secretary of War and in all Secretaries of War. I think they would appoint just the number absolutely necessary and no more. My idea was, as the committee well knows, to fix the number in the bill, and this part was stricken out, as I stated to the Senate, on the ground that the committee thought there were perhaps too many named in the bill, and it had better be left to the Secretary of War and he would be careful, by inspection and otherwise, to put instructors only where they were required.

That portion of the bill strikes the Senator as being very wrong, but there is another portion of it that seems to annoy him very much, and it is this: We provide in the bill that the Secretary of War may detail each year some officer belonging to the Pay Department for the purpose of inspecting the paymasters' accounts and offices. If he was in good earnest about this bill he would have said this: "I move to amend the bill so that it will read that in addition to the inspections now provided by law, this additional inspection may be performed by such detail by the Secretary of War." Would there have been anything wrong in that? Would that have hurt anybody? Would anybody have been injured by that? He did not even suggest an amendment. Why not suggest it? If the bill in this shape is not agreeable to his notions, why did he not suggest, in order that the Government might not be defrauded, that an amendment should be made providing that they should be only additional inspectors without getting additional pay? But they get no additional pay. Why did not the Senator suggest that? That would have cured the whole trouble; that would have removed the whole objection; but no, it must be defeated because he does not agree to that particular proposition, for the reason that somebody defaulted many years ago during or shortly after the war. Therefore it is all wrong! It is the simplest thing in the world when you take a bill of this kind where the intention is shown to increase the efficiency of any service whatever, it is very easy to attack a bill, or it is very easy to make suggestions if you desire to improve the bill by amendment.

But the Senator said further that he was astonished that there was no committee in this Senate that could be found that would prepare bills or bring them in for the purpose of decreasing expenses instead of increasing expenses. I do not care to speak of myself, but I will say this: I have introduced bills in the House of Representatives and in the Senate for the purpose of reducing expenses in the Army; and the act that stands on the statute-book to-day in reference to the organization of the pay of the Army in every particular was a bill that I introduced in Congress for the purpose of reducing expenses and for the purpose of making uniform the manner of accounts that were made by the officers who drew pay from the Government. So I could name several others. I have never tried to increase the expenses of the Army except in a legitimate and proper way as I deemed; and I believe this to be legitimate and proper; I believe it to be honest and just; I believe it to be right, and for that reason I support it.

On the same principle suppose we had no army at all and a proposition was made to organize an army of five thousand men, what would be the argument against the proposition? The argument that has been made here in the Senate would be this: There is no immediate necessity for this, therefore it must not be done; if there is, it increases the expense, and therefore it must not be done. That would be the argument, the same that has been made here; and yet I can not see that that is very good logic.

Now, I desire to call the attention of the Senate, for a few moments only, to what is proposed in this bill. I do not think the Senator ever read the bill; I do not think he has read it yet, except one or two provisions that he picked out where he wanted to attack it. I say this because he insisted that it did not increase the pay of the private soldier at all, but only the non-commissioned officers. Now let me show you what it does. It increases the sergeant-majors of cavalry from $23 to $26. It continues sergeant-majors and quartermaster-sergeants of engineers at $36; quartermaster-sergeants continue at $22, no increase there; chief musician $60, no increase; chief trumpeter $26, no increase; ordnance-sergeant $34, no increase; quartermaster-sergeant $34, no increase. The increase goes to sergeants of engineers and ordnance from $22 to $24, sergeants of cavalry and artillery from $17 to $20, corporals of cavalry and infantry from $15 to $18, musicians and trumpeters from $13 to $16, blacksmiths and farriers of cavalry from $15 to $18, artificers of artillery and infantry from $15 to $18, saddlers from $14 to $17, wagoners from $13 to $16, privates of the first class from $13 to $16, privates of cavalry, artillery, and infantry from $13 to $16.

The increase is entirely different from what the Senator stated. He said the increase was to a certain class in the Army and that was a class whose pay should not be increased. On the contrary, we find that the increase is for artificers, for blacksmiths, for wagoners, for trumpeters, and for private soldiers, an increase of $3 a month, except in the case of a few sergeants; and yet the Senator would convey the impression that the bill was to benefit a higher class in the Army and not those who need it most, when the proposed increase applies more to the privates, wagoners, and laborers in the Army than anybody else.

The total increase is $870,244 in the pay of private soldiers and a few saddlers, trumpeters, wagoners, blacksmiths, and sergeants and corporals of the Army. I will say to the Senator that the Congress of the United States has expended nearly that much money by increasing the rank of men on the retired-list that they had no authority, in my judgment, to do. I do not know whether he voted for the bills or not; I will not say; I am speaking of the body of Congress. Have you heard any complaint about that?

When the Senator speaks about an increase for these men taxing the people of this country, who makes complaint here in the Senate about the retired-list? He may have said something about it; I do not remember what it was. But who makes complaint about the higher officers of the Army when retired, as a colonel, promoted by Congress to the pay and rank of a brigadier-general? And on the retired-list of the Navy there are to-day I do not know how many men whose increase pay amounts to many thousands of dollars. Nobody complains of that; but if you undertake to increase the pay of the poor soldier, of the sergeant, of the wagoner, of the artificer, of the blacksmith, of the laboring men of the Army, then we are trying to make an aristocracy out of the Army, and this chairman of the Military Committee is at this work! The chairman of the Military Committee has fought in the Senate for years against the increase of rank by law, as the Senator well knows. I have always been found advocating an increase in the pay of these poor men, for they do not get enough. Thirteen dollars a month is not enough pay for any man in the service of his country.

Now, Mr. President, let us see what there is in this insinuation about this bill having something beneath it. It is a sweet morsel to roll under the tongue of some men when they can hang upon some little thing by which they may possibly damage some brother Senator or friend. The insinuation is thrown out that this bill comes forward now and has not been attempted before, and the impression is left that it is because of the present difficulty between labor and capital in this country that this measure is proposed. This is as false as any assertion that ever was uttered by mortal man. Such a thing never entered my mind nor the mind of any man on the Military Committee when this bill was introduced or reported. I introduced it early in the session. Nobody ever thought of any such thing, and I would be as far from contemplating that as the Senator who feeds upon that character of insinuation. No, sir; and when the Senator from Colorado spoke of the riots in Chicago being put down by our own people, that was true. Nobody asked for help. Why not again? Why is this insinuation thrown out that there is some desire or design in this bill so to use the Army? Why, sir, when we hear to-day criticism after criticism on our fortifications and on our Navy and our Army, if any man has patriotism enough to make them better or to try to put them in condition that we ourselves may place some reliance upon them if trouble should occur, we are accused of trying to get up a show before the world. I did once see a great show. That was when hundreds of thousands of old soldiers, battered and worn by hard service against their enemies in war, were marching homeward. That was a show that gladdened the heart of every loyal man and woman in this land. That was a show worthy of the nation; and in that vast concourse of men, in that great movement homeward to meet wives and children, marching under the old starry banner, and singing—

Long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave,

I failed to recognize the face of the Senator from Colorado. He formed no part of that show.

But now, Mr. President, let me call the attention of the Senate to one thing that has not been very much observed in the argument on this bill. We have an immense border and coast that ought to be protected. Why? Let me ask why should it be fortified? Is there any immediate danger? No. That is the argument which is made in opposition to this increase, there is no immediate danger. Why, then, fortify the coast? Why should we have great guns bearing on the entrance into the great city of New York? No immediate danger. What do you want with the guns? Why should you have at Fortress Monroe, or at forts in other places along the coast, great guns and men to man them? There is no immediate danger. What then do we want with them?

Wars have occurred, Indian wars have occurred; but because the Indians are quiet now, therefore they will always be quiet! Because we have no disturbance with South America, with Mexico, or with any European power therefore we never shall have any! That is the argument. If that argument is good, why are you spending money for guns? Why are you appropriating money for ships? Why are we trying to build up a navy? Will you tell me? It is to be ready if danger should occur. That is the reason, and that is the only reason for this addition to the Army. It is to form a basis so that the Army may be ready for use and be efficient when it is needed. The same reason exists for the increase of the efficiency of the Army that exists for building iron-clad or steel-clad ships for the protection of our commerce on the high seas. There is no immediate danger. Then why do we build them? This argument, it does seem to me, ought not carry great weight.

My friend from Colorado says that what I said was wanting in statesmanship. I never claimed to be a great statesman, but if I was as great a statesman as he seems to think he is I certainly would make an argument with more force on the subject of danger to this country. I have here what the Secretary of War says in the first part of his report, though I will not stop to read it. He calls the attention of the Congress of the United States to the difficulties that have taken place in the Indian Territory during the last twelve months, and not only that but he speaks of the possibility of future disturbances. He speaks of the disturbances by persons entering unlawfully the Indian Territory and calls for a more efficient law and for severer punishment. That is in the very first part of his report to the Congress of the United States at this session. Why did he do that? There is nobody fighting now, no immediate danger now. He does it because we have been in danger; we have passed through danger; we have had wars; we have had Indian troubles, and God knows we may have them again, and I suppose that is his reason for his suggestions.

Now, sir, I believe in the American idea of good wages, and I will say to the Senator from Kansas I believe in good wages for the poor man. He spoke, and so did the Senator from Colorado, about many men tramping over this country because they can not obtain work. I am sorry for that. I wish that all could, but if you will increase the Army five thousand you will at least give a chance to five thousand men who would rather go into the Army than suffer and starve, for there they would have the opportunity of getting their bread and clothes and some pay besides. You open the door there to that many men in this country, men who you say are tramping and starving. It is better than starvation.

Then, what further? When I say that, I meet the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] who is for the American idea of paying labor. I agree with him. I wish to God labor were better paid, and as he said and as I say to the Senator from Kansas, I know of no better way to do it than by competition, not competition with those abroad, but competition at home. Do our own work at home, compete with one another here in the protection of that which we use as far as we can and sell our surplus products abroad, sell much abroad and buy little in foreign markets, and in that way give employment to labor and give to it the emoluments that it deserves.

Sir, if it was left to me I would build fortifications along the coast wherever needed from Maine to Florida, on the Gulf and on the Pacific. I should want labor to build them and soldiers to man them. I would make this Government with its numbers, its patriotism, its wealth, and its heroism a power with a determination to protect and preserve its institutions and its honor. I would make it a power that would give notice to any government on earth that any approach to our shores in a threatening attitude would be promptly repelled.

You talk about a republican government not needing to preserve and protect itself! There is more reason for a great Republic like this being prepared to preserve its institutions than there is where the power is centralized and comes not from the people. There is more necessity for preparation for the preservation of institutions that are free than of others. All the governments of the earth are jealous of this Government. There is not one, there is not a monarchy or an empire anywhere that is not jealous of our institutions, and why? It is because that through our institutions the lessons of patriotism and republicanism have been promulgated and find lodgment abroad, and as the drop of water wears the rock so the light of truth falling on the minds of the subordinate classes in foreign countries instills in them the republican idea, and republicanism is undermining the throne of Europe. The power of the ruler weakens, and because of that there is that jealousy of our Government on the part of foreign countries that does not exist with us toward them. For that reason this country should at least be prepared so that if any emergency should arise and it should be assailed we could well say:

Lay on, Macduff;
And damn'd be him that first cries, "Hold, enough!"

[Applause in the galleries.]

Let us prepare for war in time of peace.

Now, Mr. President, while Senators are in favor of purchasing steel for the purpose of making guns, building ships, improving our Navy, arming for strife, will the argument against the efficiency of the Army being looked after cease? Let me ask why not prepare inland as well as for on the sea?

Mr. CAMERON rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MANDERSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAMERON. The Senator yields for an executive session. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. PLATT. Pending that, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business which was temporarily laid aside, being the bill (S. 67) to provide for the formation and admission into the Union of the State of Washington, and for other purposes.

The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-three minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate, March 29, 1886.

ASSISTANT SURGEON IN THE NAVY.

Louis William Atlee, a resident of Pennsylvania, to be an assistant surgeon in the Navy.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COMMISSIONER.

Samuel E. Wheatley, of the District of Columbia, to be commissioner of the District of Columbia.

CONSUL-GENERAL.

William L. Alden, of New York city, N. Y., to be consul-general of the United States at Rome.

CONSUL.

Charles T. Russell, of Haddam, Conn., to be consul of the United States at Liverpool.

TERRITORIAL JUDGE.

Samuel Thompson Corn, of Illinois, to be associate justice of the supreme court of the Territory of Wyoming.

JAMES B. EVANS.

Mr. LAFFOON introduced a bill (H. R. 7261) for the relief of James B. Evans; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PENSIONS.

Mr. WOLFORD introduced a bill (H. R. 7262) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the late war, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

CREDITORS OF REPUBLIC OF TEXAS.

Mr. WILLIS introduced a bill (H. R. 7263) to extend the time within which the creditors of the late Republic of Texas may file claims at the Treasury Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

AWARDS BY BOARD OF CLAIMS.

Mr. WILLIS also introduced a bill (H. R. 7264) for the allowance of certain awards made by a board of claims; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

B. B. CONNOR.

Mr. WILLIS also introduced a bill (H. R. 7265) for the relief of B. B. Connor, of Louisville, Ky.; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

EDUCATION.

Mr. WILLIS also introduced a bill (H. R. 7266) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. WILLIS. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Labor.

Mr. WILKINS. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] what may be in the nature of a parliamentary question. I have here the education bill as it passed the Senate. In the noise I have endeavored to follow the reading of this bill, and I find no change in it so far as I have discovered. There may, however, be some difference, as my attention was called off. I wish to ask whether this bill as introduced by the gentleman from Kentucky now is the same bill that has been passed by the Senate.

Mr. WILLIS rose.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I call for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIS. In reply to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will say that this is in one sense the same bill. Of course the Senate bill is before the Committee on Education, but the words of this bill are identical with it.

Mr. RANDALL. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MILLER. I move to refer the bill to the Committee on Education.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] moves that this bill be referred to the Committee on Labor. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLER] moves to amend that motion so as to refer the bill to the Committee on Education.

Mr. RANDALL. I am aware that debate is not in order on either of these motions.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to ask whether debate would be allowed for a reasonable time so that we may ascertain the reasons which prompt those motions.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Ask unanimous consent.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. WILLIS. I think the question is very well understood.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I wish to inquire whether under the rule which provides that—

All proposed legislation shall be referred to the committee named in the preceding rule as follows, viz, subjects relating to education to the Committee on Education—

Whether under that rule this bill should not go to the Committee on Education.

The SPEAKER. The House, the Chair thinks, has a right to refer this bill by a vote to any committee it chooses. If there were no vote of the House referring this bill to another committee the Chair would refer it to the Committee on Education under the rule; but the Chair has held frequently that the House, by its vote, can refer a bill to any committee it pleases, except bills for the payment or adjudication of claims, which must go to certain committees, unless unanimous consent is given.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to amend the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] by striking out "Labor" and inserting "Education."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, where, under the rules, does this bill belong?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already stated, in response to the gentleman from Illinois, that unless the House by a vote referred the bill to another committee the Chair, under the rule, would refer it to the Committee on Education.

Mr. DUNN. It belongs to some committee that will report it back.

The House divided on the motion to amend, and the Speaker declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and there were—yeas 114, nays 132; not voting 76, as follows:

The following pairs were announced:

Mr. PIDCOCK with Mr. LEHLBACH.

Mr. TOWNSHEND with Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois.

Mr. CALDWELL with Mr. STEPHENSON.

Mr. SKINNER with Mr. MORRILL.

Mr. IRION with Mr. STRUBLE.

Mr. SPRIGGS with Mr. MCMILLIN.

Mr. MORGAN with Mr. HEPBURN.

Mr. LAFFOON with Mr. LOUTTIT.

Mr. O'FERRALL with Mr. VAN SHAICK, until March 30.

Mr. WARD, of Illinois, with Mr. PARKER, on this vote.

Mr. COBB with Mr. GROSVENOR.

Mr. ERMENTROUT with Mr. ATKINSON, for this day

Mr. MCADOO with Mr. ROCKWELL, for this day.

Mr. MULLER with Mr. BUNNELL, for this day.

Mr. ADAMS, of New York, with Mr. PAYSON, for this day.

Mr. HALE with Mr. HANBACK, on this bill.

Mr. MILLS with Mr. WADE, on this bill.

Mr. DOWDNEY with Mr. LAIRD, for this day.

Mr. ARNOT with Mr. FELTON, for this day.

Mr. STAHLNECKER with Mr. OSBORNE, for this day.

Mr. VIELE with Mr. LA FOLLETTE, for this day.

Mr. RIGGS with Mr. WAKEFIELD, for this day.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. RIGGS] is absent on account of sickness. If he were here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to inquire about the pairs. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN] is paired with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY], but I am informed by some one near me here that Mr. BRADY has voted. I do not know whether he has or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk who has charge of the pairs that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] has withdrawn the pair.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] is not present at this moment.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it was at my solicitation that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY] was paired with the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GREEN]. It seems that I was under a misapprehension, and in order to have no feeling about the matter I will pair with the gentleman from New Jersey on this vote, and ask to withdraw my vote on this motion; but I wish it understood that I am in favor of the bill, and opposed to the motion to refer it to the Committee on Education.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Speaker, I think a personal explanation is in order. I was in court this morning, and sent up notes to two different gentlemen requesting to be paired. Upon my return to the House just now I was informed that I was paired with Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey. Mr. GREEN, I understand, left for his home in New Jersey on Saturday last and will be absent twelve days, and one of his colleagues informs me that if he were present he would quite probably vote as I have voted. Therefore, after consulting with a number of friends, I concluded, under their advice, to break the pair, as I think I had a right to do under the circumstances.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, in view of the circumstances I have stated, I am willing to be paired on this vote only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR] withdraws his vote and will be regarded as paired. That leaves the result of the vote yeas 114, nays 132. The nays have it, and the amendment is not agreed to. The question is upon the motion made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIS] to refer this bill to the Committee on Labor.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 86, nays 85.

Mr. REAGAN. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Several MEMBERS. Withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the call.

Mr. BRAGG. I renew it, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered; there being—ayes 44, noes 84.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 138, nays 112, not voting 73; as follows:

ADDITIONAL RULE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. GALLINGER also offered a resolution requesting the Committee on Rules to report an additional rule empowering the House by a majority vote to take any measure from a committee of the House; which was referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ZACH. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I call for the reading of that resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas recent events have clearly demonstrated that under the existing rules a bare majority of a committee of this House has it in its power to suppress any measure that may be referred to them, unless otherwise ordered either by unanimous consent or a suspension of the rules, which requires a two-thirds vote; and

Whereas this is a palpable denial of the rights of the membership of this House, a usurpation of power not properly belonging to a committee, and a species of despotism unworthy of the American Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Rules be requested to report to this House, at its earliest convenience, an additional rule, providing that the House may at any time, by a majority vote, instruct any one of its committees to return to the House for consideration, with or without recommendation, any measure that may have been referred to it.

MICHAEL TODD.

Mr. BEACH introduced a bill (H. R. 7337) granting a pension to Philemon B. Purvis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RULES.

Mr. BEACH also offered the following resolutions; which were referred to the Committee on Rules:

Whereas it was promised at the beginning of the session that the adoption of the "new rules" would facilitate the transaction of the public business; and

Whereas an experience of three months has shown the complete folly of such promise, and that the House is no better off in this respect than it was under the "old rules;" and

Whereas the right of the people to petition the Government for a redress of grievances is a right guaranteed by the Constitution; and

Whereas a corresponding obligation rests upon the Government to consider their petitions and grant such relief as may be proper under the circumstances; and

Whereas to this end Congress should obey the mandate of the Constitution, and determine "the rules of its proceedings" in such manner as to give all citizens an equal opportunity to be heard in their petitions; and

Whereas our Calendars are already loaded with many and various measures of local, State, and national importance (and legions more to come), which under the present rules (if rigidly enforced, as all rules should be) can be considered only by being called up by committees during the second morning hour, or by motion to supend the rules on the first and third Mondays of the few remaining months, or by unanimous consent; and

Whereas the practice of considering bills by unanimous consent is a serious abuse, because the favor of "recognition" shown by the Speaker to one is an unjust discrimination toward all others who may have in charge measures of equal, if not superior, merit; and because, furthermore, the practice tends to make of legislation a lottery, wherein the prizes are confined to the favored few and the blanks are distributed among the unfavored many; and

Whereas what is called the "second morning hour," when committees can call up measures for consideration, has proven a failure principally because the measures so called up have been "talked to death;" and

Whereas there is no good reason why any proposition which has been fully considered by the committee to which it has been referred and received the unanimous sanction of such committee should be entitled to any extended discussion on the floor; and

Whereas what the people want in answer to their petitions is action, and not declamation—the votes of their Representatives, and not their speeches; and

Whereas all information necessary to intelligent action upon any given measure is furnished each member in advance by the printed reports of the various committees: Now, therefore, with a view to relieve our calendars and advance legislation,

Be it resolved, That clause 5 of Rule XXIV be amended so as to read as follows:

"After the morning hour shall have been devoted to reports from committees (or the call completed) the Speaker shall again call the committees in regular order and continue such call from day to day; upon which call each committee, on being named, shall, for the period of one hour, have the right to call up for consideration any bills or resolutions unanimously reported by it on a previous day on either of the Calendars of the House; and in the consideration of each bill or resolution debate shall be limited to ten minutes—the time to be equally divided between the advocates and the opponents of the measure: Provided, That when the hour herein prescribed shall expire while the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union is considering a bill the said committee shall rise without motion therefor.

"And be it further resolved, With a view to regain the time lost by the holiday recess and numerous other adjournments, and to avoid a prolongation of the session into the heat of summer, that the hour of daily meeting of this House shall be 11 o'clock a. m. during the remainder of the present session."

GRANT COTTAGE, MOUNT M'GREGOR, N. Y.

Whereas there is H. R. 2891 now pending before this House for the forfeiture of the land grant of the Northern Pacific Railroad conterminous with said road constructed after the 4th day of July, 1877, and for the cancellation of all patents to said lands; and

Whereas serious differences of opinion exist as to the power of Congress to forfeit so much of said grant as is conterminous with the constructed portions of said road, which differences may now, as they have heretofore defeated the forfeiture of any portion of said grant; and

Whereas a bill (H. R. 4223) is now pending before the House for the forfeiture of all that portion of said grant conterminous with any belonging to the main line of said road, extending from Wallula Junction, in Washington Territory, to the city of Portland, in the State of Oregon, embracing approximately over 3,000,000 acres of lands, as to the power of Congress to forfeit which no doubt exists, inasmuch as said road company has failed, neglected, and refused to build their road on said main line westward from Wallula to Portland, and has not even commenced any construction thereon, and therefore the said land grant is that far clearly unearned by any interpretation of said original grant; and

Whereas large numbers of people are settled in good faith upon many portions of said land and are making bona fide and permanent homes thereon, and numerous homeless people are desirous of settling much of the remainder of said lands, and great solicitude exists among all of said people as to the probable delays and further postponement of a declaration of forfeiture by reason of making said forfeiture dependent upon the success of the aforesaid bill for a forfeiture of the whole grant westward from a point in Dakotah Territory; and

Whereas the settlement and development of said immense domain along the Columbia River are retarded and great public injury produced by a further withholding of said lands from settlement and the delay in forfeiture: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands are hereby instructed to report H. R. No. 4223, declaring forfeiture of so much of the aforesaid grant between Wallula and Portland, and providing for the protection of settlers thereon, with such recommendation as said committee shall deem proper.

Mr. McRAE introduced a bill (H. R. 7450) for the relief of S. H. Pearce, of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL—THIRD AND FOURTH CLASS POSTMASTERS.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have been requested by a special committee of the postmasters' national convention to present a memorial, setting forth the grievances of postmasters of the third and fourth classes, to ask it be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

There was no objection, and the following memorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads:

A memorial from postmasters.

To the honorable Senators and Representatives in Congress assembled:

The undersigned were appointed a special committee by the postmasters' national convention, which assembled in Chicago February 15 and 16, to prepare a memorial to Congress setting forth the grievances of postmasters of the third and fourth classes, and, in compliance with their duty, beg to present certain facts regarding the inequalities of present postal laws and regulations.

In carrying out the trust imposed, the committee begs to assure Senators and Representatives that the postmasters whom they represent are actuated in this matter by no spirit of selfish aggrandizement, but that they seek only that which is fair and just. They feel that the justice and liberality which are recognized factors in the general policy of the Government in the treatment of its employés have been denied them by the operation of existing laws. They do not assume, however, that there has existed any hostility upon the part of Congress toward postmasters as a class, but they are inclined to believe that the present state of things exists solely because you have not been fully informed as to the hardships they have been called upon to endure.

We have no mysterious or unsupported assertions to make regarding our work, and it is far from our purpose to undertake to mislead you in respect to the operation of present postal laws, for their inequalities are so plain and so palpable that even a cursory examination of the subject will reveal their existence.

It would seem almost unnecessary to call your attention to the delicate and confidential relations a postmaster holds to the public at large. There is no officer of the Government of either high or low degree who comes so near the heart of the people as he; nor is there any function of the Government that has as much to do with the social and business interests of the country as the post-office. As our cities grow and expand, as their wealth increases, great post-office buildings become a public necessity, until millions upon millions of dollars have been invested in property of that character, and no complaint has ever, as yet, been made by the people where these immense structures have been erected that too much money was expended upon them; and the large number of bills that are introduced into Congress at every session providing for the erection of Government buildings in the pretentious cities of the country only shows how anxious the people are for a magnificent post-office, and how much interest they take in postal affairs. The post-office is, in fact, the magnet around which the commercial and industrial interests of the country revolve. When business is prosperous, or when trade is backward, its condition is as surely indicated by the transactions of the post-office as is the direction of the wind by the action of the weather-vane. The post-office, too, keeps pace with the church and school-house, and is as necessary to our progressive civilization as either of them, and we claim that too much consideration can not be bestowed upon a system so far-reaching in its influence and so vital in its effect.

We desire to impress upon you at the outset that this is not a movement fathered by any political party. Politics was a theme studiously avoided by the late convention, and any attempt to introduce it would have been most vigorously denounced. We may say, however, as a matter of fact, that so far as we are able to judge from information obtained, the convention was made up equally of members of both political parties. But it is a matter of congratulation that so many postmasters of Republican faith have been, and are, taking such an active interest in the cause.

It is well known that the salaries of postmasters are based upon the aggregate receipts of their offices. These receipts, in offices of the third and fourth classes, consist almost entirely of moneys arising from the sale of stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and the rental of post-office boxes. It will be readily seen, therefore, that any reduction in the general rate of postage could not fail to result in the lowering of salaries based upon receipts of postage in almost the exact proportion by which the rate is lessened. It has been the settled policy of Congress to provide the people with the amplest postal facilities at the smallest possible expense, and reduction in postage has been the order of the day, the letter rate having been reduced from 3 to 2 cents, while the unit weight has been advanced from a half to an ounce. Then, in still further pursuance of this line of action the rate on second-class matter was reduced from 2 to 1 cent per pound when sent out by publishers, and the unit weight increased from 2 to 4 ounces when sent out by others than publishers.

It seems to have escaped the attention of Congress that these sweeping reductions, while being wonderfully beneficial to the public and a magnificent testimonial of legislative wisdom in meeting the wants of the people, could not help but affect disastrously all salaries based upon receipts from postage, and we claim that when these reductions were made, the effect of which was undoubtedly intended to increase the quantity of mail matter handled in every office and at the same time cut down the gross receipts, the relation of compensation to labor performed should have been so fixed that postmasters would be at least in part protected against the reduction in their incomes which has been the result of that legislation.

Now, in support of this proposition we need only refer you to the following facts, deduced from the report of Postmaster-General Vilas to the present Congress: In the year following the decrease in letter postage the number of offices advanced from the fourth to the third class by reason of the natural increase of business was but nineteen, and of this number eight were in the rapidly growing States of Kansas and Nebraska; while during the same period one hundred and nine offices retrograded from the third to the fourth class, clearly showing the disastrous effect of that one reduction, and that, too, in the face of a known and demonstrated increase of 5 per cent. in the postal business of the country. And not only that, while one hundred and nine offices were so affected as to drop one grade, yet it brought many others to the very verge, and they only escaped by the most vigorous efforts upon the part of postmasters to prevent that result. Many citizens who had a pride in their town and felt an interest in its development regarded it as a positive disaster to have the grade of their post-office reduced; and, out of the most commendable motives, increased their postage accounts in order to save, as they thought, the honor and prestige of their city; and it was only by such exertions as these that many were saved. The people generally take pride in the fact that their post-office is of the Presidential grade, and regard it as a substantial evidence of the growth and prosperity of the town when their post-office is advanced from the fourth to the third class; and, likewise, they view with alarm any lowering of its grade.

But even if the reduction in postage had produced the anticipated result of increasing the postal business of the country to such an extent as to prevent any decrease of compensation to postmasters, yet it does not require a mathematician to demonstrate that even in that event they would be expected to perform one-third more labor than before, while the pay remained the same. If it was the purpose of Congress to deal fairly by us, then it becomes a clear proposition that when our duties were augmented our commissions should have been increased.

Another matter which is of great interest to all third-class offices, as well as to a large number of those of the fourth, is the subject of office expenses. These expenses consist of rent, light, fuel, clerk-hire, stationery, and other incidentals. In all offices of the first and second grades allowances are made by the Department covering all such expenditures, so that under no circumstances do the salaries of such postmasters suffer any diminution on account of such outlays. But in third-class offices located in many towns but slightly inferior in importance to those containing second-class offices, and whose citizens need and rightfully demand as well-located, convenient, and well-appointed offices, in every respect, as those of the second class, postmasters are compelled to liquidate all such expenditures out of their salaries or their private funds. And it is a well-known fact that in some instances towns of general inferior commercial importance contain second-class offices simply because of the fortunate possession of some school or college or large industrial establishment, whose use of the mails produces sufficient postal revenue to throw the office into the second grade.

A third-class office may be located at the intersection of two or three railroads; it may be a growing, thriving, prosperous community, and the work of the office, in its separation and distribution of the mails, may be extremely excessive and severe, but yet the gross receipts of that office may entitle the postmaster to a salary of only $1,900—all his expenses for rent, light, and fuel, and the bulk of his expenditures for clerk-hire, being liquidated out of his own pocket. Not so, however, with the incumbent of a second-class office located in a town, perhaps, of even less population than the other. His town may be practically lifeless, possessing no elements of prosperity, but yet because of the fortunate possession, as before stated, of some school or college or some one or two large manufacturing establishments, his office is raised to the dignity of the second class and the Government steps in and pays all his office expenses.

The postal law at present in force specifically denies to postmasters of the third class any assistance whatever toward meeting the reasonable demands of their patrons, permitting them to retain from the receipts of their office their salary and nothing more, except, perhaps, the pittance allowed for clerk-hire. The question of rent is one of the most serious moment. Every community demands and expects that the post-office shall be located at the most accessible point in the town, no matter what the rent may be, and they feel, too, that their office should be supplied with all the latest and most approved fixtures, never taking into consideration that the expense of all such paraphernalia must be borne by the postmaster himself. And we can assure you that instances are by no means rare where, after paying all the expenses of their offices, there are postmasters whose salaries will not compare with those received by their clerks.

The attention of Congress has been repeatedly called to this great injustice in the reports and recommendations of the Department, and we are glad to be able to cite you to the fact that the present efficient First Assistant Postmaster-General has taken the most favorable view of the matter, and recommends to your consideration every concession we ask for. He says:

"In the act approved March 3, 1885, a proviso was incorporated giving the Postmaster-General discretionary authority to lease premises for use of post-offices of the third class from July 1 last, but provision for the payment of rent was not made. That is, the Postmaster-General was authorized to make disbursements for rent of premises leased for third-class offices out of the appropriation for rent, fuel, and light for the present fiscal year. This appropriation, however, was $10,000 less than the sum estimated for first and second class offices.

"Postmasters at offices of the third class are now compelled to pay the expenses of rent, light, fuel, stationery, and miscellaneous items, and in some cases a part of the clerk-hire. It is a hardship to compel these postmasters to pay these expenses from their salaries or from their private funds. As stated by the Postmaster-General last year (see report of the Postmaster-General for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1884, page 20), there is no reason why these expenses should not be paid at third-class offices as well as at first and second class offices.

"I renew the recommendation, therefore, that provision be made for the payment of rent for offices of the third class. I am of the opinion, also, that the Government should provide for the payment of expenses for fuel, light, stationery, and miscellaneous items for these offices."

And we may observe in connection with the above that there is not only a desire upon the part of the Department to make such an allowance, but the general public would most emphatically approve of it, for we are fortified by the presence of hundreds upon hundreds of petitions, signed by thousands of persons, who ask that you come to our relief, and with but two or three exceptions, all the leading journals of the country have expressed themselves as favorable to our cause.

Now, in further referring to this feature of our complaint, we are reminded of the fact that there is no other branch of the service of the Government where its employés are required to transact a large, intricate, and responsible business without being furnished with all the necessary facilities to properly conduct it. It has remained, however, for Congress to require postmasters of the third and fourth classes to provide at their own expense everything necessary to transact the business of their offices, and to protect the public property, for which they are held to such strict account. In offices of the classes named, the postmaster, from his own means, must provide a satisfactory outfit of boxes, furniture, and fixtures of every description, including desks, conveniences for keeping the blanks, and a suitable safe for the security of Government funds and valuable letters. In fact, the only articles furnished by the Department are the dating and canceling stamp and the letter scale. It would seem no more than just and fair that where the Government transacts a large and confidential business like that of a post-office it should provide the necessary fixtures and appliances to properly conduct it.

The question of compensation to postmasters at the smaller separating post-offices for the large amount of extraneous labor they perform is a matter of great moment to hundreds of worthy men, and should receive your careful and considerate attention. The complaints from this source are numerous, and only those who are advised upon the subject can form any idea of the onerous character of the work they perform and for which, in many instances, no compensation whatever is received. There are many offices where the labor involved in the separating and distributing of mails for other offices is equal to one-half the entire work of the office, and their arrival and departure are at such unseasonable hours as to compel them to be at their offices from early morning until late at night.

This service is so exceedingly exacting and the compensation so very inadequate whenever any allowance is made, that it is almost impossible to retain clerks for that service, many of whom enter upon it and remain long enough to learn the scheme of distribution and then suddenly quit, leaving the postmaster to do the work himself as best he may, and, as a consequence, the public is made to suffer. We doubt whether there is a third or fourth class postmaster in the United States who is allowed as much for clerk-hire as he is compelled to pay out. General Stevenson, the First Assistant Postmaster-General, speaking upon this subject in his first annual report, says:

"Clerks in post-offices should be fairly compensated for their services. Their hours of duty are long, and their work, to be efficiently performed, requires close attention and study. Separating clerks, or clerks at offices of the third and fourth classes, where mail is distributed for other offices, merit favorable attention. Many of these clerks are not paid enough to induce them to take proper interest in their work." (See annual report for 1885, page 222.)

We would also beg to respectfully call your attention to some inequalities in the money-order business and ask relief therefrom. We are confident that we represent the exact sentiment of every third and fourth class postmaster of a money-order office when we assert that there is not one such postmaster but would gladly pay to the Government from his salary each year a sum equal to all commissions derived from the money-order business could such payment relieve him entirely from the transaction of such business. This is, perhaps, neither the time nor place for detailed statistical statements, but to the few general observations we may present we cordially invite the fullest investigation. Every postmaster's experience will corroborate our assertions, and about their correctness there can be no doubt.

We claim that there is no adequate compensation for the transaction of the business, neither in view of the responsibility assumed nor the labor performed. In any other business it would seem almost ridiculous to consider 50 cents to $2 per week sufficient compensation for the transaction of a business considered of such importance that a separate bond of from $2,000 to $5,000 is required to insure its faithful performance; but in this service the figures quoted quite fairly represent the responsibility assumed and the pay received. When the compensation is considered in the light of the labor performed the result is even less creditable to the Government. We do not hesitate to say that in the average third and fourth class money-order offices the weekly fees received will but little more than pay for the actual risk involved in the daily transportation of the funds received to the designated depositary to which they must go before the postmaster's responsibility ceases. An expert copyist can only make fair wages at a rate of 10 cents per 100 words; but in the service in question men who are not experts are compelled to perform this class of work at an average of less than 5 cents per 100 words, or less than one-half of what is considered adequate in any other business.

There is probably not a third or fourth class post-office conducting a money-order business where the actual work involved will not consume one-third of the postmaster's entire time, provided he attends to it in person, and yet it brings to him, as a rule, not one-twentieth part of the income which he derives from his office. The postmasters would be more patient with regard to this money-order business did they see, even with economical management and the allowance of insignificant commissions for the work, the Department could barely make its income from the service meet its expenses in conducting it; but when they see a vast surplus fund gathered together every year as the result of the grinding process to which they are subjected, then they feel that the time has come to present their side of the story to Congress and let it judge of the hardships to which they are subjected. The surplus revenue last year from the money-order business alone was $408,923.20; which is ample evidence that the fees charged the public for the issuing of money-orders are too high, or the compensation allowed postmasters for the transaction of the business is entirely inadequate. We have some of the most startling facts and figures regarding the labor performed in the conduct of the money-order business, which we will be glad to lay before your committees whenever it may be their pleasure to receive us.

The postmasters' convention also instructed us to address you upon the subject of mailing letters upon trains. This has come to be a serious source of loss to many postmasters throughout the country, and calls for a speedy remedy. While many persons are actuated in the matter by a desire to curtail the revenues of post-offices, yet there are many who do so simply as a matter of convenience, not thinking or caring as to the effect it may have upon the salary of the postmaster. This is not only an unfair way in which to treat an officer of the Government, but it is a wrong which should be abated, and we appeal to you to apply a remedy.

In this connection we beg to call your attention to the reference made to this matter by Postmaster-General Vilas in his first annual report, in which he most eloquently and incisively enters into the merits of this question. We may say, however, that it was the sentiment of the convention that the surest and speediest way to prevent such injustice is to change the rate of postage on first-class matter when mailed on postal cars from 2 to 4 cents per ounce.

And, finally, gentlemen, we beg to commend our cause to your consideration. We do not come to you as Republicans or Democrats, but as fellow-citizens who are officers of the Government, seeking relief from unjust and unfair discriminations. It is the first time in the history of the Government that any organized attempt has been made upon the part of postmasters to secure legislation in their own behalf, which fact we trust will not operate against us at this time, now that we have placed our grievance before you. While you legislated in the interest of the people in reducing letter postage, and were especially considerate to the press in cutting off 50 per cent. on second-class matter, yet we have been the sufferers, and we can not believe that you would systematically legislate in the interest of the people and the press to our detriment. Almost every grade of postal officials have secured legislation except postmasters, and they have stood back waiting only for some one to make a move. There are 51,000 in the two classes we represent, and we ask from you not sympathy or kindness, but pure and unadulterated justice.

We are possessed of many facts and figures regarding the points we have undertaken to briefly lay before you in this memorial, which we would be glad to personally present to the Post-Office Committees of the Senate and House, and respectfully ask for permission to appear before them and make our claim, and subject ourselves to any inquiries they may be pleased to institute.

Very respectfully,

JOHN H. PATTERSON, Chairman,
J. G. JOHNSON,
SAM. A. RISLEY,
Committee.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Ways and Means be discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the House No. 397, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 397) to amend Title XXXV, entitled Internal Revenue, of the Revised Statutes.

There being no objection, the Committee on Ways and Means was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and the same was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

TREATY WITH MEXICO.

Mr. SPRINGER submitted the following resolution of inquiry; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, any correspondence with the Mexican Government, or with the claimants, relative to the claims specified in the fifth section of the act of Congress approved June 18, 1878, filed after the publication of the papers contained in the President's message to this House of February 25, 1884; and to inform this House if any payments have been made on said claims after said date, and if so, at what date and of what amount.

INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. SPRINGER also submitted the following resolution of inquiry; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with the following information:

First. The number of the Indian tribes within the jurisdiction of the United States and the number of Indians belonging to each tribe.

Second. The number of acres of land owned or set apart as reservations for the use of each tribe, respectively.

Third. The amount of annuities paid each tribe, and the acts of Congress authorizing the same.

Fourth. The amount appropriated to each tribe, respectively, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, for the following purposes; that is to say, for schools, schoolhouses, and other educational purposes; for subsistence and clothing; for police, labor, and mechanical and agricultural implements and instruction; and for physicians and medical supplies; for transportation and expenses of Indian agents, inspectors, and all other employés in the Indian service.

Fifth. A statement of the value of real estate and personal property owned by each tribe respectively, including school-houses, mills, shops, and store-houses located on Indian reservations.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to furnish the information above indicated in detail as to each tribe, showing the property owned by these wards of the nation, and the amount expended by the Government out of the public Treasury for their support and care, so that the House may be able to judge upon the facts whether the property of these wards is or is not abundantly sufficient if properly managed by the Government, acting as their guardian, for their support, education, and care, and whether, if so, these Indian wards could not hereafter be maintained and educated at their own cost and expense.

FREE-SHIP BILL.

Mr. DUNN submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 24th day of April next, be set apart for general debate only on H. R. bill No. 7219, commonly known as the "free-ship bill;" and that the following Tuesday and Wednesday (the 27th and 28th days of April), after the morning hours for the call of committees for reports and for the consideration of bills, be set apart for the further consideration and disposal of said bill, the previous question on which, and all amendments thereto then pending, shall be considered as ordered at 4 o'clock p. m. of said last-named day.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found duly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

A bill (S. 831) for the relief of George S. Storrs, of Texas; and

A bill (S. 812) granting a pension to Mrs. E. A. Benham.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed for one hour, if necessary, to call committees for reports. The hour begins at five minutes past 3 o'clock.

TAX ON MANUFACTURED TOBACCO, ETC.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Ways and Means, reported, as a substitute for H. R. 3425, a bill (H. R. 7465) to amend section 3357 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 2 of the act of June 9, 1880, and section 3389 of said Revised Statutes as amended by section 16 of the act of March 1, 1879; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 3425 was ordered to be laid on the table.

BRIDGES ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 41) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Saint Joseph, in the State of Missouri, and to establish it as a post-road; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRISP, from the Committee on Commerce, also reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. R. 3369) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. BARRY, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported back with an adverse recommendation the bill (H. R. 5384) to regulate the rate of postage on fourth-class matter; which was ordered to be laid on the table, and the accompanying report printed.

RIGHT OF WAY THROUGH INDIAN TERRITORY.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported, as a substitute for the bill H. R. 5866, a bill (H. R. 7466) granting rights of way for the construction and operation of railroads across the Indian Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 5868 was laid on the table.

HEATING APPARATUS IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. DIBBLE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, reported back Executive Document No. 128, letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Supervising Architect, recommending an appropriation for heating apparatus in certain public buildings; and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON NAVAL ARCHITECTURE, ETC.

The SPEAKER. The hour for consideration of bills under the rules begins at thirty-five minutes past 3 o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Printing. The Clerk will read the title of the joint resolution heretofore called up by this committee, which is now under consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 58) authorizing the printing of a naval report.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, the other day, during this call, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice was passed over by unanimous consent until I should return to the floor. I am now here for the purpose of calling up a bill on behalf of that committee.

The SPEAKER. But that order, whatever it may be, can not, in the opinion of the Chair, interfere with the consideration of the resolution already before the House. When that is finished the gentleman can call attention to the order in question.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I simply wish to reserve my rights.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution, the title of which has been read, is now before the House for consideration; and the question is on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, the merits of this report having been fully discussed when the matter was under consideration last Thursday, and no member having signified any intention to make any further remarks on the subject, I now, having the matter in charge on behalf of the Committee on Printing, move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FARQUHAR moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS, MARSHALS, COMMISSIONERS, ETC.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. On behalf of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, I now desire to call up the bill (H. R. 6977) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRISON. I understand the gentleman calls this bill up with the same rights of consideration that it would have had when his committee was reached on the previous call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause to be read from the RECORD of the 24th instant the request as made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], together with the statement made by the Chair. The Clerk will also read the entry made in the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. SPRINGER (when the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice was called) said: Mr. Speaker, it was the intention of that committee to call up a very important bill in regard to the salaries of certain officers of the United States courts, but I do not see the chairman of the committee in his seat. I am not a member of the committee, but I ask unanimous consent that the committee may not lose its place in this call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice may be allowed to call up business of that committee, if they desire to do so, when the chairman, who is now absent, makes his appearance on the floor. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the entry on the Journal.

The Clerk read as follows:

During the said call, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice be allowed to call up business reported from said committee when its chairman, then absent, shall make his appearance on the floor.

The SPEAKER. That is the order which was made. The Chair will state that at the time the order was made there were about fifteen or twenty minutes remaining of the hour allotted to the consideration of bills called up by committees.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I do not see that the order as read gives any right to call up this bill.

The SPEAKER. What was the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] a few moments ago?

Mr. MORRISON. I made an inquiry whether or not the gentleman from West Virginia would proceed with the consideration of this bill with the same rights that he would have had if he had proceeded when his committee was regularly called.

The SPEAKER. The request made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] was that the committee should not lose its place. The Chair can only give his own understanding of the matter. The Chair, in fact, supposed that the gentleman from West Virginia was only temporarily absent from the Hall, and would make his appearance in a few moments.

Mr. REED, of Maine. That seems to be obvious from what has been read. I was not present at the time; but that is the idea which the proceedings, as read, convey to me.

The SPEAKER. The request was that the committee should not lose its place in the call. As the Chair has just stated, when the request was made there were only, as he now remembers, fifteen or twenty minutes of the hour remaining. Of course it is very difficult for the Chair to say what should be done in such a case. The Chair thinks the House should construe the order and determine whether the gentleman from West Virginia is to occupy two hours, or whether he shall have the fifteen or twenty minutes which he would then have had and also an hour on the next day, if the consideration of his bill should not be completed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I am afraid if the former course were adopted it would give rise to more parliamentary maneuvering than the House could get along with.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to have the matter settled so that there may be no difficulty in such cases hereafter.

Mr. REED, of Maine. If a gentleman, by being providentially absent when his committee was called—I am not speaking of this case, but speaking generally—could get two hours instead of an hour and fifteen minutes, it might be quite a boon.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I had supposed it was well known to the House that on Monday morning last I asked leave of absence until to-day, which was granted. I understood that when this order was made—it was made knowingly—the motion of the gentleman from Illinois was made with knowledge of the facts. My understanding and the understanding of the committee has been that as the committee would have been reached then, we would now have the same time which would have been allowed to us had our committee responded at the regular time. I ask and claim on behalf of the committee the time we would have been allowed had we been regularly called in our turn—the two hours.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, from what has been read to us, the House must have understood at the time what was perfectly apparent to me, that it was only a momentary absence from the House which was contemplated. To extend it to any time the chairman of the committee should be absent was not what the House could have contemplated.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. The House is bound to know what its record discloses. It is bound to know the course of things.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Not in these matters of unanimous consent.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. That is a kind of ignorance the gentleman can not plead.

Mr. STORM. What occurred was this: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] turned around and said, "I do not see the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] in his seat;" indicating by his manner and creating the impression upon those who heard him that the gentleman from West Virginia was out of the Hall only temporarily. That was the understanding near me; that if he came in he was then to have the right to the fifteen minutes which remained.

Mr. HAMMOND. If it had not been considered by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice that this bill could be called up when the chairman of that committee [Mr. GIBSON] returned, it being known that he had been granted leave of absence, that committee would have called it up through another member. But when the House gave unanimous consent that the chairman of the committee who had reported the bill should have the privilege of calling it up on his return, I did not presume any advantage would be taken of it having been passed over. Now, I understand that all he wants, all his committee wants, is the same amount of time which he would have been entitled to had he been in his seat at the time. The committee, I understand, would have had until the close of that hour, and then if it had gone over to a full hour the next time the subject was resumed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. It is all I ask, that this committee shall have now the same time it would have had then.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is only fair.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Has the Chair determined this matter?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman is entitled to the time he would have had if his committee had then been called.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Does a single objection suffice? If it does, I am ready to make it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the order of the House.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia calls up for consideration the bill (H. R. 6977) relating to the compensation and duties of United States attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

UNITED STATES ATTORNEYS.

Be it enacted, &c., That district attorneys of the United States shall hereafter be paid monthly for their services the following annual salaries, in lieu of all fees, allowances, and salary now authorized by law: Southern New York, $8,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern and Western Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, Northern and Southern Illinois, California, Kentucky, and Northern Georgia, $5,000 each; Maryland, Kansas, Northern Ohio, Indiana, Eastern Louisiana, Eastern Missouri, Western Arkansas, South Carolina, Western North Carolina, Eastern, Western, and Middle Tennessee, and Western Texas, $4,000 each; Oregon, Eastern and Western Virginia, $3,500 each; Connecticut, $2,500; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; in the Territories, $3,500 each, except the attorney for the Territory of New Mexico, who shall be paid a salary of $4,000 a year; and all other United States district attorneys shall be paid each a salary of $3,000 a year. In all proceedings, civil or criminal, including prize cases, where fees or compensation of any kind are now by law authorized to be taxed against and paid by the United States for services of district attorneys or their assistants, no fees shall be charged or allowed on that account. In all cases, civil or criminal, including prize cases, where services are performed by district attorneys or their assistants, and the costs are taxed against other parties than the United States, the amount of such costs or fees for such service shall be collected and paid into court. United States district attorneys shall, under the direction of the Attorney-General, attend to the interests of the United States in every suit or proceeding in which the United States is concerned, in any of the courts of the United States or in the courts of any State or Territory, or attend to any other interest of the United States in their respective districts: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as avoiding or interfering with any contract that the Attorney-General has made with any district attorney for services heretofore or hereafter to be rendered; and in all cases pending at the time this act shall go into effect, for which compensation is provided by fees, the judge of the court wherein such cases are pending shall ascertain and allow such reasonable part of the whole fee as would be properly chargeable were the whole services performed as he in his discretion may think just: Provided further, That the Attorney-General, when in his opinion it becomes necessary for the public service, may employ the district attorney of one district to defend or prosecute suits, civil or criminal, or to transact any other business connected with the Department of Justice in a district other than the one to which the district attorney so employed belongs, and may allow him such reasonable compensation as may be agreed upon.

SEC. 2. That the district attorneys, marshals, and clerks shall be allowed, once for each term of court, the actual amount paid by them for transportation in going to and returning from the place where the court may be held in the district, the itemized accounts for such transportation to be made out and verified as hereinafter provided in other cases where transportation is allowed. District attorneys and their assistants shall also be allowed the actual amount paid by them for necessary transportation to and from their places of abode to places where criminal examinations are held, or from one such place to another.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS.

SEC. 3. That United States marshals shall hereafter receive annually for their services the following salaries, payable monthly: Southern district of New York, $5,000; Northern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern and Western Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Northern and Southern Ohio, Northern and Southern Illinois, California, Indiana, Maryland, Eastern Missouri, Kentucky, Eastern Louisiana, Western Texas, and West Virginia, $4,000 each; Northern Georgia, Western North Carolina, Kansas, Oregon, Western Missouri, South Carolina, and Eastern and Middle Tennessee, $3,500; New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Delaware, Nevada, Southern Florida, Connecticut, Northern Mississippi, and Southern Mississippi, $2,000 each; in the Territories, $3,500 each; and all other marshals shall be paid a salary of $3,000 a year. All money collected by marshals on process in behalf of the United States, or under the laws of any Territory, and all costs for fees and expenses of marshals taxed against parties other than the United States, shall be collected by the marshals and be paid into court; and at the end of each quarter the marshal shall render a return of the moneys so collected to the Attorney-General, with receipts from the clerks of the courts for the sums paid as herein required, which returns shall be verified by the oath of the marshal; and if this statement is not received by the Attorney-General within thirty days from the close of the quarter, no further payments shall be made the marshal on account of salary until such statement is received. Upon application to him for service, the marshal, before service is made, shall exact a deposit for the costs thereof in all cases not brought by the United States, except in suits brought under chapter 3 of the Revised Statutes, for wages of seamen, wherein the costs, if not collectible from the parties to the suits, shall be charged by the marshal, clerk, and district attorney in their accounts against the United States, and shall be adjusted and paid by the accounting officers in the same manner as costs in cases brought by the United States. It shall be the duty of the marshal to scrutinize the bills of the deputies, sheriffs, or constables, or whoever may be employed to serve process, and when he finds the same to be correct and in accordance with law he shall pay the same; but in cases where he deems it advisable for his own protection he may withhold 25 per cent. of the amount until said bills have been audited and allowed at the Treasury, and when so allowed he shall pay the amount found due each in full. At the close of each term of court the marshal shall make up his accounts for all fees and disbursements and submit the same to a circuit or district court, in accordance with the provisions of the act regulating fees and costs, approved February 22, 1875, which shall be examined and passed upon by the court at each term before its adjournment.

SEC. 4. That there may be allowed each United States marshal one clerk and one chief deputy, whose salaries shall be paid as provided in section 2 for the payment of marshals. The salaries shall be $1,800 a year in each of the following districts: Northern New York, Southern New York, Massachusetts, Eastern Pennsylvania, District of Columbia, Southern Ohio, Kentucky, Northern Illinois, West Virginia, and California. In other districts the salary shall be determined by the Attorney-General, but shall not exceed $1,200 per annum in any case. No clerk or chief deputy shall be appointed in any district unless the Attorney-General shall deem such appointment necessary for the efficient performance of the public business. In all districts where courts are held at more than one place at which grand jurors are impaneled the Attorney-General may, in his discretion, allow the marshal a clerk or chief deputy (but not both) at such place, in addition to the one hereinbefore authorized, if the business of the office requires it, at a salary not to exceed $1,000 a year. The Attorney-General shall provide a uniform system of book-keeping and returns, and furnish books and blanks for this purpose to United States marshals. It shall be their duty to keep all the accounts, books, and papers of their respective offices in such manner as may be required by regulations prescribed by the Attorney-General, and to perform such other duties as such regulations may require. All books, papers, and accounts relating in any way to official business shall remain in the office of the marshal and be transferred by him to his successor in office, and shall be open at all times to the inspection of parties interested. It shall be the duty of the chief deputy marshal to assist the marshal in attending upon the sessions of the court, and to perform all other duties required of him by the marshal or the court. No officer of the court shall require payment from any juror or witness for stating his account for expenses of transportation or for administering oath to the same; and it shall be the duty of the marshal to examine said bills before paying the same, and to strike out improper charges if any are made therein.

SEC. 5. That the marshal's clerks, the chief deputies, and other deputies shall be appointed by the Attorney-General, upon the recommendation of the marshals of the respective districts, and their oaths of office shall be filed in the Department of Justice; and they shall be of good character and be able to read and write in the English language, and be subject to removal for cause by the Attorney-General, by the court, or marshal: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way repealing or modifying sections 2021, 2022, 2023, and 2024 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 6. That deputy marshals shall be appointed in the manner provided in the foregoing section for such localities in the district as the judge of the district or circuit courts may authorize and require for the efficient transaction of the business of the United States courts of such districts in each locality. No person shall perform the duties of a deputy marshal unless appointed and qualified in the manner herein provided, but district or circuit courts may appoint, upon the recommendation of the marshal, any sheriff or constable, holding commissions as such under State authority, to serve the writs or execute the processes issuing out of the courts in such district, after having been duly commissioned a deputy by order of the court. In all cases where practicable it shall be the duty of the marshal to send writs and processes of court by mail, directed to the deputy marshal residing in the locality where writs are to be served or processes to be executed, or to the sheriff or constable appointed to serve the same in such locality, whose duty it shall be, after service, to return such writ or process by mail to the marshal; and in no case shall fees be charged or allowed for traveling between points where writs or processes were sent by mail, or where it was practicable to send them by mail. The fees now allowed by law for marshals for serving writs and processes shall hereafter be allowed to the officers serving the same, except for committing and discharging prisoners; and the clause in section 829 of the Revised Statutes prescribing 50 cents for the same is hereby repealed. No fee for serving process shall be paid to a chief deputy. Guards, when actually necessary, may be employed to assist deputy marshals, sheriffs, or constables in charge of prisoners and witnesses before commissioners or justices of the peace, but not more than two before the same officer shall be employed on any one day.

SEC. 7. That deputy marshals, sheriffs, and constables, while serving court processes, shall be allowed for transportation by public conveyances the amount actually paid therefor, which shall be stated in an itemized account, and shall not exceed the usual amount charged for such transportation. For traveling where there is no public conveyance they shall be allowed 10 cents per mile each way, and for serving writs and processes the fees provided by law. The costs shall in each case be indorsed in items on the back of the writ when the return is made.

SEC. 8. That the circuit or district courts of the United States may, in cases of emergency where the necessary processes of the courts can not be promptly executed by the marshal or his regular deputies so as to secure the ends of justice, enter an order of record requiring the marshal or one of his deputies, or a person appointed as special deputy marshal by the court for that purpose, to perform a particular service or execute a particular writ; and for such service there shall be allowed such compensation as may be just and reasonable, but not exceeding $2.50 a day, and actual and necessary traveling expenses, in lieu of fees and mileage; and where it shall become necessary to assign a deputy in one part of the district to perform duty in another part thereof, the judge of the court of such district may ascertain and allow a reasonable compensation therefor. All accounts for such service shall be stated in items and verified by the person performing the service, and approved as a separate account by the judge who may make the order requiring the same.

UNITED STATES COMMISSIONERS.

SEC. 9. That the judges of the circuit and district courts of the United States, and the judges of the Territorial courts shall divide each district into commissioners' districts, consisting of one or more counties or parishes, and they shall appoint one or more United States commissioners in each commissioner's district, as may be required for the efficient and economical execution of the laws. Such commissioners shall have jurisdiction only of such offenses as are committed in their respective districts, except in cases of change of venue or where no qualified commissioner resides in the commissioner's district where the offense was committed, and except also in cases of offense against the postal laws of the United States, in which the jurisdiction shall remain as now provided by law. United States commissioners shall receive for their services such fees as are now allowed by law, except that in all criminal cases heard by them they shall only be allowed $1 for issuing process to arrest, and $1 for a recognizance or bond for court, including affidavits of justification of sureties and acknowledgments, and for all other writs and processes issued, for all oaths administered, for docketing, hearing, and trying the same, and for all services performed, the sum of $5, and no more, for each case; but where two or more charges are preferred against any person at the same time the commissioner shall be allowed only for a fee in one case. In preliminary examinations, where there is probable cause of guilt, the commissioner shall bind over the accused, if he shall give the bail required, to appear for trial before the court in his district which may be held nearest the place where the offense was committed; and if he can not give the required bail the commissioner shall commit him for trial to the nearest jail where such prisoners can be safely and economically kept, and shall in both cases transmit all the papers in the case to the clerk of the United States court to be held in said district nearest the place where the offense was committed, at which court grand juries are impaneled; and the clerk shall notify the district attorney thereof; but any accused person who may be committed in default of bail may, upon the order of the judge, be removed to and tried at that place in the judicial district where the court will be held next after his commitment. Justices of the peace shall receive the same fees as United States commissioners for services in criminal cases. Their accounts shall be verified by oath and forwarded to the United States attorney of the district, to be submitted to court for approval. It shall be the duty of commissioners and justices of the peace to examine and certify to the marshal for payment bills of witnesses for transportation and attendance.

CLERKS' FEES.

SEC. 10. That the fees earned by the clerks of the United States courts, the supreme and district courts of the Territories, and the courts of the District of Columbia for services in civil and criminal cases and in naturalization cases, and for making out, certifying, or authenticating all papers, and in bankruptcy proceedings, and for duties of master in chancery, or as special commissioners or referees by order of the court, or taking or authenticating depositions, issuing certificates admitting attorneys to practice, and in all matters of any name and character incident to their office or by virtue or authority of the court, and as United States commissioners, if holding said office, shall be included in their semi-annual returns to the Attorney-General; and it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to decide what expenses may be paid by such clerks out of the surplus emoluments of their offices. At the end of each quarter they shall make out an itemized statement of all costs paid into court in United States cases, showing what disposition has been made of the same and in what cases they accrued, and submit the same to the district court, who shall examine the same, and cause such clerks to subscribe an oath to the correctness of each and every item in such statement. If the judge approves such statement as correct, he shall indorse his approval thereon in writing, and the clerk shall thereupon transmit said statement to the Attorney-General. The clerks of the circuit and district courts, of the supreme and district courts of the Territories, and of the supreme court of the District of Columbia shall not receive annually exceeding $2,500 each for their services; and where one person is clerk of both the circuit and district courts, such clerk shall not receive for services in both capacities a sum exceeding $3,000 per annum, except the clerks of the district and circuit courts for the southern district of New York, who may each receive $3,500 annually for their services. From the fees and emoluments earned and so reported by such clerks no one of them shall be allowed an amount exceeding the maximum herein provided; and after deducting the payment of deputy clerks, of office expenses, and any other allowances authorized by the Attorney-General, the balance of such fees and emoluments, if any, over and above the said maximum amount, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States, according to the provision of section 844 of the Revised Statutes, which payments shall be ascertained at the Treasury Department upon quarterly returns to the First Auditor of all fees earned during each quarter, to be made under oath and approved by the court; and upon failure to make said quarterly and semi-annual reports within thirty days thereafter, the clerk shall be summarily removed by the judge, upon the request of the Attorney-General.

FEES AND EXPENSES OF COURT OFFICIALS.

SEC. 11. That the judges of the Territorial courts, United States district attorneys and their assistants, and United States marshals and their deputies, when required to use any public conveyance in the discharge of their respective duties, shall be allowed the actual amount paid for transportation, not exceeding the usual fares on such public conveyance, and no more. All accounts rendered for such transportation shall be verified by oath of the person making the same; and he shall state in such oath that he did not use for any part of such transportation a pass or pay a less fare than that stated in the account. Accounts for the transportation of prisoners and guards by public conveyances shall be rendered for such sum as was actually paid for such transportation, not exceeding the usual fare; and vouchers, verified by oath, shall in all cases accompany such accounts.

SEC. 12. That United States marshals shall hereafter be allowed their actual expenses in the following cases, namely:

For transporting prisoners in any State or Terrritory, or from one State or Territory to another, on any public conveyance, the amount actually paid for transportation of themselves and for each prisoner and necessary guard, but not exceeding the usual fares. Where free transportation is used no charge whatever shall be made or allowed. If reduced transportation is secured, this fact shall be stated, and the actual amount paid shall be charged in the account, and no more.

The amount actually and necessarily paid for meals of themselves, prisoners, and necessary guards while in transitu, not exceeding 50 cents per meal.

The amount actually paid deputy marshals and guards for their services, not exceeding $2 per day.

For travel in going to serve or returning from serving any process, warrant, attachment, or other writ, including writs of subpœna in civil or criminal cases, the actual amount paid for transportation on all public conveyances, and no more, the account to be stated as in case of transporting criminals; and for each mile actually traveled to serve any such process as aforesaid, where there is no public conveyance, the amount actually paid, not exceeding ten cents per mile going and returning. For all travel required of them by law on any public conveyance they shall be allowed, in all States and Territories, the actual amount paid, as herein provided, and no more; and for every mile actually traveled where there is no public conveyance, the amount actually paid therefor, not exceeding ten cents per mile each way. All allowances for travel and meals are not to be construed as compensation, but as reimbursements for actual and necessary expenditures in the discharge of official duties; and all transportation provided for in this act shall be computed by the nearest practicable route. All allowances for mileage and transportation in excess of the amount actually paid are hereby declared illegal; and no credit shall be allowed to any of the disbursing officers of the United States for payments or allowances in violation of the provisions of this act. An affidavit that the account is just and true in all respects, and that the expenses charged therein were actually and necessarily incurred, must accompany each bill. In all cases the account must contain the items of expenditure. The Attorney-General shall prescribe forms, rules, and regulations for presenting all accounts of court officials, to all of which forms shall be attached the oaths to be taken and subscribed.

SEC. 13. That hereafter jurors and witnesses in all of the States and Territories shall receive their actual and necessary expenditures for transportation when using any public conveyance, in lieu of mileage, but not exceeding the usual fares; and when there are no public conveyances they shall receive the mileage now allowed by law for travel to and from court; and witnesses shall receive one dollar and a half a day and jurors shall receive two dollars a day during actual attendance at any court or courts, and for the time necessarily occupied in going to and returning from the same.

SEC. 14. That section 365 of the Revised Statutes shall be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 365. No compensation shall hereafter be allowed to any attorney or counselor at law for services unless employed and retained by the Attorney-General for a purpose authorized by law, and then only on the certificate of the Attorney-General that such services are actually necessary, and that the same can not be performed by the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General or the other officers of the Department of Justice, or by the district attorneys, which certificate shall be filed of record in the Department of Justice and in the court where such services are to be rendered, before such special assistant attorney or counsel is authorized to appear for or represent the United States; and before such special assistant attorney or counsel can receive any compensation for his services he shall file with the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department a copy of such certificate of the Attorney-General and a statement of the account and the amount actually due such attorney or counsel. No compensation or remuneration shall be allowed any such assistant counsel or attorney for traveling or other personal expenses incurred in or about the performance of his duties as such special assistant attorney or counsel, and no compensation shall be allowed under this section to any person or firm in excess of $10,000 during any one year."

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

SEC. 15. That section 5392 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows:

"SEC. 5392. Every person who, having taken an oath before a competent tribunal, commission, commissioner, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States or any rule or regulation prescribed by the head of any Department of the Government of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly, or that any written testimony, declaration, deposition, or certificate by him subscribed is true, willfully and contrary to such oath states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $2,000 and by imprisonment at hard labor not more than five years, and shall, moreover, thereafter be incapable of giving testimony in any court of the United States until such time as the judgment against him is reversed."

SEC. 16. That the clerks of the Supreme, circuit, and district courts of the United States, and of the Territorial courts, and of the courts of the District of Columbia, and their deputies, are hereby authorized to administer oaths and give certificates thereof in all matters pertaining to the duties of their offices.

SEC. 17. That the Attorney-General is authorized to appoint examiners and agents of the Department of Justice, and to detail officers and clerks of said Department, to the extent of appropriations for such service, to investigate frauds, or attempts to defraud the Government, or any irregularity or misconduct of any officer of the Department of Justice, or to collect evidence in cases in which the United States is a party. They shall have authority to administer oaths to any persons testifying in the course of such investigation. Any person who knowingly testifies falsely before any such examiner, agent, officer, or clerk shall be guilty of perjury, and shall, on convictiou, be punished as provided in section 5392 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

SEC. 18. That any person who steals, takes away, falsifies, mutilates, or otherwise alters, destroys, or conceals any book, record, or paper by law required to be in the custody of any marshal, clerk, or other official of the United States, or who counsels, aids, or abets such stealing, taking away, altering, falsifying, mutilating, destroying, or concealing of any such book, record, or paper, shall be guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined not exceedlng $1,000, or imprisoned at labor not exceeding three years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 19. That the provisions of this act shall apply to all the States and Territories and to the District of Columbia. All acts or parts of acts granting double or increased fees to marshals, deputy marshals, clerks, or district attorneys in any State or Territory, or in the District of Columbia, are hereby repealed, and the general laws prescribing such fees are hereby re-enacted as to such States and Territories, except as herein modified or amended.

SEC. 20. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the first day of January, 1887; and all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. DIBBLE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DIBBLE. I wish to ask whether this is the time to move amendments, or whether the bill will be again read for amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The general debate has not yet been had. After that the bill will be read by sections for amendment.

Mr. HISCOCK. Is it in order to ask for the reading in connection with this bill of the one for which it was reported as a substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HISCOCK. I hope unanimous consent will be given for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has been informed that this bill was reported by the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice for several other bills, which by unanimous consent were at the time laid upon the table, while this was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I object to these interruptions if I am to be charged with the time which they consume.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia is entitled to the floor and will proceed.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I did desire to have submitted this bill to a vote of the House without any discussion; so far as I was concerned I was willing to ask for a vote directly upon it from the fact that at the last session of Congress a bill identical in principle in its provisions and only differing as to the size of salaries was passed almost unanimously by the House, but was stricken off by the Senate under the rule which prohibited legislation on appropriation bills. But I have been notified by members they desire to speak for and against the bill, and therefore I must perform a duty which otherwise I would not have done, and that is to explain the provisions of the bill now presented to the House.

In brief, the object of this bill is to change the system of compensation, as now allowed to the minor officers of the United States courts, from one of fees, depending on the amount of business they perform, to a fixed and certain salary; thus relieving the officers of these courts from the temptation, which is naturally induced by such a system, of enlarging the amount of their compensation; and at the same time relieving the people from the burden of prosecutions and persecutions that have been carried on for the purpose of swelling the compensation of these officials.

To illustrate how terrible this thing can be sometimes, I have seen in one city—in my own little State, composed of but one-fourth of the judicial business of that small State—the people camped in the streets and sitting upon the sidewalks by the thousands, in attendance upon the court.

I have seen in one session of that court over nine hundred indictments made and carried forward from court to court, until after two or three terms, with thousands of parties and witnesses there in attendance, over seven hundred of them were dismissed with one sweep of the pen. I have seen carried on in that one State, having an average of only about 450,000 population, within the last ten years, as high as one-sixth, and never less than one-tenth, of all the criminal prosecutions that have been carried on in all of the courts together in all of the States and Territories of this great land. And still, with this remarkable showing of prosecutions, you may take up the reports of the Attorney-General and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and you will find that there has not been money enough collected in the prosecutions carried on in that State to have paid for one single witness that attended the court during the year. During all those ten years there have been only twenty or thirty convictions for any offenses against the revenue laws, and yet for the purpose of swelling the fees of these court officers this enormous amount of prosecution was carried on.

After we undertook to investigate this thing, at the last session of Congress, the expenses of this set of officers dropped in one single year $28,000, or from seventy-odd thousand they fell down to about forty thousand dollars; and you may take up other districts and you will find the same state of things. In the southern district of the State of Illinois there was an annual saving of twenty-odd thousand dollars as soon as the investigation commenced. And so it has gone on all over the country.

Now, sir, shall we not here take a step that will make it impossible for these abuses against the people to be carried on in future? It is a well known fact that wherever there are moieties, wherever there are rewards given to the informer to come out of the punishment, such proceedings become frauds and persecutions. The law as it formerly existed in any of the States, giving persons who informed a certain portion of the fees collected from the delinquent, filled the courts with frivolous complaints and prosecutions.

This bill undertakes to fix a certain salary as a compensation for each one of these officers. I may say here, Mr. Chairman, that the committee were unanimous upon the principle of allowing salaries instead of fees. The committee was also pretty nearly unanimous in the details of the bill; but of course we had great difficulty in arriving at the details. We had to take such information as we could get on which to base it, and undertake in that way to fix the salaries of each one of these district attorneys and marshals throughout the country. It is impossible for us to have done perhaps exact justice to each and every one of these officers; indeed, it would have been beyond human knowledge and foresight to measure the salaries and affix to them the exact dollar or cent to which they should be entitled. But, sir, if perhaps some members of this body may think that their favorite district attorney or their favorite marshal or other officers of their favorite States have not received quite as much as they think they ought to get, and not as much perhaps as some other officer of some other State receives, they should also remember that this bill, like all other measures enacted by human legislation, must have its imperfections; and if they undertake here to amend it, and make each of its provisions suit each individual member of this body, then it will suit nobody else; and a bill having for its object the grand and great purpose that this has, a bill for the benefit of the whole people of the country, will be defeated by selfish aspirations and ambitions.

There are other things to which I might allude. I might tell you, gentlemen, to your utter astonishment, that United States commissioners, mere justices of the peace, living in little out-of-the-way towns, have by this system of prosecution and fees succeeded in swelling their salaries in some cases as high as $10,000 a year, and in some instances even to the enormous sums of $12,000 and $15,000. The way it is done is to send out blank affidavits to hunt up and work up business, and this has been carried on not only in the South but also in the North. Why, in the State of New Hampshire, your clerk there, only allowed $5 a day for the time the court is actually in session, by an arrangement with the court adjourns it from day to day and gets his $5 per day from the commencement of the year to the end of it, except on holidays. The same course has been found in one of the Illinois districts; and these abuses are being carried on all over the country, which is being tax-ridden and burdened by this spirit of fraud. Why, the First Comptroller of the Treasury told me this morning that under this late decision of the Court of Claims allowing commissioners docket fees he had no doubt the United States would have to pay over a million of dollars in arrearages for fees claimed by these United States commissioners.

Now, this bill undertakes to correct all that abuse. I say to you frankly I do not know whether it is efficient for that purpose or not. It may be that there ought to be a limit beyond which commissioners should not go in any case,—an aggregate limit.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman from West Virginia allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman has said that this bill corrects a decision of the Court of Claims. I wish to ask him whether it seeks to correct it for the past.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Oh, no; we can not undertake to correct it in the past. If these people are entitled by law to get these fees under the decision of the court, let them get them. All we can do is to guard against the same thing occurring in the future.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I think you are going in exactly the right direction in making these officers salaried; but I would like to know on what basis you have fixed the compensation.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I am just coming to that.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would be glad to direct your attention to one case, as it concerns my own State. I notice you give to the district attorneys in both the northern and the southern districts of Illinois $5,000 each; and yet, when you come to Indiana, which is but a single district with four different places for holding court, having eight terms of United States courts every year, you give the district attorney $4,000. In other words, you give Illinois $10,000 and Indiana $4,000. I hope it is not because you have at this time a Democratic district attorney in that State.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I assure the gentleman from Indiana it is not because he lives in Indiana that I want to punish his State.

Mr. Chairman, we have had some difficulty in arranging the details under this bill, to get at what would be fair in the way of compensation to the different officers. We availed ourselves, as we state, of the information that was to be had from the very elaborate and thorough investigation of this subject at the last session of Congress by this committee. In addition to that, we called upon the Attorney-General and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the Comptroller, and all the officers of the Government who could give us any information upon the subject; and we finally boiled down the information in the report from the Attorney-General's Office, giving the gross earnings and the net earnings and then the average net earnings of each one of these officers for the last ten years. And upon all this we undertook to fix these salaries as nearly as possible in accordance with what the various officers had averaged within that time.

Now, we do cut down these earnings, and we intended to cut them down. Gentlemen may complain that we do not give the marshals what they have been getting for the last twenty years; that we do not give the district attorneys what they have been making for the last twenty years. But sir, the very necessity for this bill is to prevent these officers from getting so much as they have been getting during that time. We know much of this money they have earned, as shown by these reports, was ill-gotten gains; that much of these fees which they got they got from the persecutions of the people. And now we propose to give them fair, honest, living salaries and stop that.

Gentlemen should not expect that a district attorney should receive a salary that would be equivalent to a living for a man who had no other business. The district attorney has to be a good lawyer in order to be qualified for being district attorney. He must attend courts, and in every court he attends he gets civil business, and in most cases gets more of the civil business than other attorneys. His very relations with the courts give him many advantages. He gets bigger fees and more of them; and he should not get such a salary as would cover all of his business. One gentleman complained to me that the district attorney in his State had been making $5,000 before he became the district attorney, and now we had cut him down to $4,000. He was engaged in a hazardous business, he was running the risk of his profession, he was traveling all over the country, while the $4,000 that this bill gives him is a certainty and he has the opportunity of getting whatever else he may make.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I notice that the bill fixes the salary of the United States district attorney for the eastern district of Missouri at $3,000 a year and the salary of the district attorney for the western district of that State at $4,000 a year. I ask the gentleman from West Virginia if it is not a fact, as shown by the Attorney-General's report, that the attorney of the western district of Missouri tries more cases, does more business, and has done so for the last five years, than the attorney of the eastern district?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Yes, sir; and I will explain to the gentleman why that is so. This bill requires attorneys to turn over all the money received in the civll suits brought by the United States. In the western district of Missouri there is very little civil business; in the eastern district of Missouri, containing the great city of Saint Louis, there is a large amount of civil business.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour for the consideration of bills has expired.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCMILLIN reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6977) relating to the compensation and duties of United States district attorneys, marshals, and commissioners, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

RETURN OF BILL TO SENATE.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Chair will lay before the House a communication from the Senate.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 29, 1886.

Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill of the House No. 1151, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the Committee on Naval Affairs will be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and it will be returned to the Senate in accordance with the request just read.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent the Committee on Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2392) for the relief of William H. Whiteside & Co., or their assignees, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MURDER OF CITIZENS OF CARROLLTON, MISS.

Mr. O'HARA. Mr. Speaker, I desire to introduce a resolution and ask its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objections.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it is a matter of public information that on the 18th of March, 1886, in the town of Carrollton, the county seat of Carroll County, Mississippi, a lawless band of persons rode to the court-house and then and there indiscriminately murdered, by shooting, a number of peaceful citizens of the United States; and

Whereas it is alleged that the governor of said State of Mississippi has absolutely refused to take effective measures to bring to justice said murderers; and

Whereas it is alleged that the grand jury in and for said county of Carroll has neglected to act in such manner as would bring said murderers before the courts to answer for their crimes; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States guarantees to each and every one of its citizens full and adequate protection of his life and the enjoyment of his property: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed by the Speaker to investigate the facts connected with said alleged murders, and to report, by bill or otherwise, such measure as will check or prevent in future the wanton and barbarous destruction of human life.

Resolved, That said committee, when appointed, shall have power to subpœna witnesses, administer oaths, and do all other acts necessary to a full investigation of the subject-matter; that said committee may appoint a subcommittee to visit the State of Mississippi to take testimony, and do such other acts as may be necessary in the premises; and that the expenses of the committee shall be paid from the contingent fund of the House, not to exceed —— dollars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolutions?

Mr. MORRISON. I have no objection to the resolutions being introduced and referred to the Committee on Rules, which has power to report at any time.

Mr. REAGAN. I object, Mr. Speaker, because the resolutions propose to deal with a subject over which we have no constitutional power.

SECTION 3860 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. PETERS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. 7474) to amend section 3860 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:
